CHAP. XI. the night of the 2d of March, from whence a fevere cannonade and bombardment was carried on against the town, and repeated on the enfuing nights. Whill the attention of the army was occupied by the firing of houses and other mischiefs incident to this new attack, they beheld with inexpreffible furprize, on the morning of the 5th, fome confide. rable works appear on the other fide of the town, upon the heights of Dorchester Point, which had been erected in the preceding night, and from whence a 24 pound and a bomb battery, were foon after opened. Some of our officers have acknowledged, that the expedition with which these works were thrown up, with their fudden and unexpected appearance, recalled to their minds those wonderful ftories of enchantment and invisible agency, which are fo frequent in the Eastern Romances. mai where is me troops have returned to their respective countries; and that they (the Heffian troops) should be under no controul of either King or parliament ; for the express words of the treaty are, " that they shall remain under the command of their general, " to whom His Most Serene Highness has entrusted the fame." The debates on these affairs were long and animated in both houses, particularly with the Lords, where the Duke of Richmond moved for an address, of a confiderable length, to his Majefty, in which, (befides feveral pointed observations re-lative to the treaties at large) he took a full and comprehensive view of American affairs in general, and demonstratively shewed from various laborious and accurate calculations, that the use of 17,300 mercenaries for the prefent year, would not, taking in all contingencies, cost the nation lefs than one million and an half fter. an expence, he maintained, not to be paralleled in the history of mankind, for the fervice of an equal number of men; therefore moved that his Majefty would be gracioully pleafed to countermand the march of the troops of Heffe, Hanau, and Brunswick ; and likewise give directions for an immediate fulpension of holtilities in America, in order to lay a foundation for a happy and permanent reconciliation between the divided parts of this distracted empire, This motion was, however, rejected by the usual majority, of about 100 to 32, including proxics, but was attended with an unufual proteft, reciting the terms of the address at large.
