tory of poor Milly Stockbridge's flend sh, unreasonable jealousy. Womanlike I made mental reservations in my con-templated revelation, for I feared the effect of his hearing the whole unpleas-ant tale. But I was sure that in the ineffect of his hearing the whole unpleas-ant tale. But I was sure that in the in-terval which must elapse before Dicky and I could be alone long enough for any extended confidential talk I could map out a story which would satisfy his wounded vanity at my reticence and yet leave untold the unpleasant details it was advisable he should not know.

I stirred in his arms, the clasp of Why Does Dicky Color?

He kissed me again, not roughly this time, but with infinite tenderness, then released me and picked up my Junior, who crowed delightedly at being taken into his father's strong arms.

"I believe the little beggar actually knows me!" he beamed, raising the baby high above his head.

"Of course, he knows you," I returned, indignation in my voice at this implied doubt of our year-old baby's mental superiority.

Dicky laughed, his old lazy, teasing laugh, which told me that whatever tension had been in our interview was gone. I settled my hat sedately, tucked seems to see the domestic happiness of the man she loved so hopelessly, and because of my own joy I felt a sincere compassion for the woman thus shut away from happiness.

Dicky gave me a quick, almost furtive look, then, with Junior still in his arms, bent his head to mine.

"You're a darling, Madge," he said, with seeming irrelevance. "Now run along to your guests. I'm going to get acquainted with my son."

And, of course, womanitie, as I walked slowly toward the house and Lillian, I could not help torturing myself with the query:

"Why should Dicky be so especially appreciative of any kindly expression of feeling upon my part toward Edith care."

The mention of one of my guests made me think a bit apprehensively of the others.

"Did you say the Fairfax girls were here?" I asked.

Did I fancy it or did Dicky color a bit beneath his tan

"Leila is," he said. "Come down with Lillian, Marion and me."

"Oh! Why didn't Edith come, too " I tried to make my yoice express genue. "Oh! Why didn't Edith come, too I tried to make my voice express genuine regret and failed miserably. I gained the knowledge in the comprehending look Dicky gave me.

"Tinker Bob"

by Carlysle H. Holcomb O. POSSUM AND MAJOR POLE CAT.

As Tinker Bob wandered on into the forest, he began thinking about what the larger of the three foxes had said.

"I want to know where they live," said Tinker half aloud, and he clutched tightly the Knowledge Stone. Instantly there stood before him the home of O. Jossum. And, sure enough, there was Major Pole Cat knocking at the door. Tinker could not be seen, yet he was able to see and hear everything.

O. Possum came to the entrance of his home with his usual snarl.

"Don't look so sour," said Major Pole Cat. "I told you about it, so I'll take the meat and leave you the feathers for your beo. Then you can sleep longer."

"Look here, Major Pole Cat, you are so stubborn, let's cast lots. We will each walk backward to yonder tree with our eyes shut, and when we think that we are close to it come in?" asked Major Pole Cat. I told you about it and I guess I'll have to part in it to."

"You can have the feathers, and I'll have the meat," O. Possum had always been a selfish creature.

"Not a bit of it!" said the major. "I told you about it, so I'll take the meat and leave you the feathers for your beo. Then you can sleep longer."

"Look here, Major Pole Cat, you are so stubborn, let's cast lots. We will each walk backward to yonder tree with our eyes shut, and when we think that we are close to it come in?" asked Major Pole Cat. I told you about it to." I'm asleep and I don't like to be dis-turbed."

But you always call around when I masteep and I don't like to be disturbed."

"You mean you're always asleep, and if anyone sees you they have to wake you up," replied the Major.

"Well, what do you want?" asked o. "Something unnecessal."

"Listen!" Major Pole Cat looked about to make sure that no one was listening: "I heard Jerry the Jay Brad old Man Fox had been drowned and Lady Duck was back in the forest to care for his children."

"Ha! Ha!" laughed O. Possum. "Who ever heard of an old woman duck bringing up a family of foxes? That's too funny for anything."

"Jerry the Jay also said that the three little foxes were running around hunt-" was danger for Lady Duck. He knew also, because he had seen the Stone of Knowledge, that O. Possum was angry and would try some trick on Major Pole Cat and would perhaps kill Lady Duck.

He hurried away to tell the story to the forest detective. Chief Porcupine. Perhaps he could tell of some way to prevent any trouble. Anyway he could offer advice, because he had dealt with O. Possum and Major Pole Cat before.
