"Nonsense!" the black eyes snapped decidedly. "All girls are fools now-adays; but no matter, you have chosen between us. My will is made, and I will not change it, but you will never be again to me what you were before."

clasped before her.

Miss Barbara Snyder was proud. Miss Barbara Snyder was fond of her own way. But she was still a woman, and in her heart of hearts she loved John Barton, her handsome nephew, dearly. His mother, her only sister, had died when he was a little child, and his father dying soon after, Miss Barbara had, in a fashion, adopted him. Sbe had indulged him from the first day of his entrance into her house; she had watched over him and made him her one object in life. He had been the gleam of sunshine in her life, and to his honor be it said, he had never been unworthy of the love and confidence which she gave him. "Aunt Barby" was to him the only person in the world, and although people marvelled at the affection of the hright-faced young man for his grim old Aunt. it was genuine and true. He had gone through college in a thoroughly satisfactory manner, and afterwards had settled down into as steady and trustworthy a young business man as there was in the city, and for three years had behaved entirely according to his aunt's wish in every request.

quility of Miss Barbara's household were broken up by a rumor which came to her ears—John, her John—was paying attention to somebody! She was at first incredulous, but as the cays went by she was forced to believe it: for one night John, sitting at her feet, his yellow hair shining in the firelight, told her with confusion and embarrassment that "he was going to be married."

Miss Barbara was a good woman, but she was very whimsical, a little selfish, and above all, very jealous of her own dignity, and the knowledge that John had asserted his own independence, and actually planned out his future without consulting her beforehand, was a hard thing for her to bear. She was not patient nor forgiving, and the result of John's confidence was a very unpleasant scene. She who had never spoken harshly to him before, overwhelmed him with hard, bitter words, and then, when he was gone, wept herself to sleep over his "ingratitude," as she called it.

When at last he was really married, her anger knew no bounds, and his first visit after that event ended as we have seen.

Miss Barbara was at first disposed to be a bit critical and captious; but the young girl was so anxious to please, so sweet-tempered and amiable, so quiet, and self-forgetful, that Miss Barbara's severity meited away by degrees, and at last she began to love her attendant, and to try in various little ways to make her cheerful and contented in her new home.

There was a comical expression of despair on the young fellow's face at this unpropitious beginning, but he said no thing.

"Nephew John, I'm disappointed in you! I am not angry, but I'm deeply grieved—"

"Why, Aunt Barby!" The blue eyes of her listener opened wide, but she silenced him with a stately gesture.

She loved Alice dearly, but even she did not take the place of the absent one. His handsome face haunted her day and night, and often, as she heard a noise in the hall or at the door, she would look up eagerly half expecting to see him as she used to do.

"I am getting old," she said to herself. "Perhaps I was a little hard with him.
