He maintained that this appeal suspended judgments rendered, and that the functions of the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery were at an end in the matter as it was now in the hands of the higher court. The Clerk of the Crown replied that the case presented a new feature, and he would, therefore, have to consuit the Minister of Justice. He did consult him and the result, as may be imagined, was a ruling against White's counsel and a refusal to grant scrutiny.
