CHAPTER XXVIII. ON THE GOLD COAST.

But though I feel the witchcraft

How great soe'er the charm may Tell England I'll forget her never, Oh, wind, that blows across the Sea!

Heat like an oven, all nature lying still and nerveless under the fierce rays so vertical that a man has no shadow save a shapeless blotch all round him on the ground—so deadly in its strokes that all the Europeans in the seething colony are indoors, with blinds drawn, and fans waving, and every device for lessening the intense heat in full force. Europeans do not live long here. They either die and go to fill the little cemetery where the palm trees wave and the monkeys chatter over the graves, or they battle with the deadly sickness of the place and go home shorn of health and strength, and all that makes life worth having, by the pestilential climate of the unbealthiest corner of all this fair world.

It is Cape Coast Castle at its hottest and unhealthiest of climates, and in a pretty house with deep verandas and with drawn blinds lounge a young couple, who a year ago came out from England full of hope, courage, and bright anticipations.

They were both healthy and strong—the climate was not going to hurt them and their means were very fair. In a few years they would have saved money enough to go back to England and settle down in comfort if not in actual affluence.

Richard Adair had seen all this fair future before him on his wedding-day, only a week before he sailed for his new appointment, whither his bride had willingly consented to accompany him.

She was an orphan, with no near relatives, or perhaps she might not have decided so quickly. Richard was her world—without him life was all a blank—with him all brightness and sunshine. She was quite sure the climate would not hurt her, and the salary sunshine. She was quite sure the climate would not hurt her, and the salary was so good.

The young husband was to receive just three times as much out on the Gold Coast from the firm he was engaged to as they were giving him at home. A house was to be placed at his disposal, with a stipulated number of servants, and a comfortable passage out provided for himself and his wife. No wonder he could not see the drawbacks in the face of such temptations as these, or understand the halfpitying way his friends spoke to him, nor the genuine emotion with which many of them bade him good-bye. He had his Alice by his side, and the world before him—at his foot, it seemed like a ball, and he had nothing to do but make his way.

He understood it all now, as he sat gasping for breath in his pretty house—for it was pretty to look at, when the creeping and venomous abominations that haunted severy corner wereoutof sight, watching his eleeping wife, and every now and then whing the drops from her pale face.

Alice was the shadow of her pretty

Alice was the shadow of her pretty self now—only a very few weeks had passed before she was seized with the fever that sooner or later lays its hands on all Europeans, and struggled back to life and a semblauce of health only to be striken down again. A little to life and a semblauce of health only to be stricken down again. A little daughter had come to her some few weeks ago—a shriveled, stunted creature, fever cursed before its birth, that had only opened its eyes on life for a few brief minutes and shut them again, finding the burning air of Liberia more than its little frame could stand. Alice had never rallied from the shock of her child's birth and death, and the physician had that day told her husbaud plainly that she never and the physician had that day told her husbaud plainly that she never would unless she could be got home. In England she might rally, in Africa never; and he was wondering in his own mind how to compass her return. It was hard to give up all his prospects, but her waning life and his failing strength and exhausted energies were plain proof of the necessity. "By the very next ship, my darling," he murmured, "if we reach home beggars. Life is before all. What is it, dear—what is it?"

She had started up wide awake, as sleepers do start sometimes, and was staring past him and out at the open door with wild, fear dilated eyes. "What startled you, dear?"

"The man, the man !" she gasped. "What man?"

"There, there!"

When a man is drowning his rescue is a question of timely help. It is the same thing in disease. Many a time the doctor says of a man whose condition is hoppless, "If you'd begun in time you might have been cured."

This is especially true when the disease affects the lungs. Delay is dangerous. The timely use of Dr. Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery will result in a quick cure of deep-seated coughs, bronchitis, and weak lungs. Even when hemorrhages have been frequent and profuse "Golden Medical Discovery" has been used time and again with the result of a perfect and permanent cure. Mr. McCauley, of Leechburg, Armstrong Co., Pa., had eighty-one hemorrhages, and after other medical aid had failed he was completely cured by the use of "Golden Medical Discovery."

"I think you were dreaming, my darling. You were fast asleep, I fancy."
"I didn't dream I saw him. I saw him quite plainly."
"One of the niggers, child. You are not afraid of them."
She shook her head.
"No, it was not one of them, Dick."
"A white fellow! There are lots of white scamps about; but he must have come and gone like a ghost. Everything was very still, and I never heard a footfall."
"Nor did I; but I saw him as plainly as I see you. Dick, do you think it is a warning?"
"Of what, child?"
"Of what, child?"
"Of what is coming to me, Dick—of the time when you will be all alone, with nothing left of your helpless wife but a mount under the palm trees yonder."

with nothing left of your helpless wife but a mound under the palm trees yourder."

"My fanciful darling," the young husband said, straining her to his heart with an inward shudder at her ominous words. "It was either a dream, which I think it must have been, or else someone is really prowling about. It is not likely, though, in this heat. But I'll see."

He laid her gently back upon her pillows and went out on to the veranda. There was no one visible except one or two negro servants, on whose black skins and wool-protected heads the sun made no impression.

They had seen no one, nor was anyone visible between the house and the sea, which stretched out about a quarter of a mile away from the house, a gleaming, glittering expanse, looking in the glare like molten silver.

A ship lay out there, a dark mass on the sbining water. Still and silent, with no sign of life aboard her, and awnings and wind sails showing above her scorching decks. Not a creature was to be seen out of doors; the very blacks were in the shade somewhere.

Richard Adair went in again, the perspiration pouring from every pore even with that elight exertion, and sat down once more by his wife.

"'A bodiless creation,' as Hamlet's mother remarks," he said. "There's not a creature to be seen. Nothing but a salamander could stand the heat today."

mother remarks," he said. "There's not a creature to be seen. Nothing but a salamander could stand the heat today."

"It was a warning," she repeated, dreamily. "It was a frightful face, Dick dear; more like a wild beast than anything human, and yet while it stood there looking at me, I went back like a flash of lightning to Merrion Royal, Do you remember Merrion Royal, Do you remember Merrion Royal, Dick?"

"Why, it was there I first saw you, Alle, just inside the park gates. As if I could ever forget it!"

"Why, I was only a little girl, and I thought you such a fine gentleman."

"I had vague ideas of the same sort myself in those days," he said, with a smile and a sigh. "I was just let loose upon the world, and thought it hardly large enough for me. I remember wondering who the pretty demure-looking little lassie was that seemed so shy."

"Seemed! I was shy. I was dreadfully frightened of everybody. I thought Mrs. Bruce, the housekeeper, the grandest lady I had ever seen, and wondered however she could think of a poor little thing like me. She was my mother's cousin, you know, and very kind to me."

Her poor, wan face brightened at her recollections of that far-away time in England when she, an orphan schoolgirl, had been sent for to stay at Merrion, and had been the beginning of so much that was eventful in the lives of the twin brothers.

"Lord Merrion was a grand old gentleman," she said, pursuing her retrospections, "but terribly stern—at least, I thought so. He spoke to me once, and I nearly died of fright at it."

"Bless me, child, what did he say to you to produce such an effect?" said her husband, waving the fan he held gently over her face.

"I don't know. I hav'n't the least idea. I was far too scared to recollect. I remember what he said to Mrs. Bruce, though."

"What was it?"

When it Hurts To Cough

The cough that hurts, the cough that gets tight in the chest is daily getting deeper and deeper into the bronchial tubes and is making directly for the lungs, to become pneumonia, inflammation of the lungs or consumption.

Such coughs are sometimes referred to as "graveyard coughs," because they usually bring their victim to that last resting place.

Dr. Chase's Syrup of Linseed and Turpentine has long been known as mother's favorite remedy for croup, bronchitis, coughs and colds. It gains in popularity every day and now has by far the largest sale of any similar preparation.
