R. McKAY & Co.

Allan Charlton's Secret

He apologized for giving me so much trouble. He said he had an important business engagement. I smiled to myself, for I knew the business was nothing more than going over to the Cotage with some new books for Blanche

I set myself patiently to work. The hot July sun was pouring in at the window, and one by one I slowly unrolled the musty old parchments, searching for the deed he had described to me. I was not successful, and very soon a heap of documents lay on the ground beside me. I came to one at last tightly rolled, and well secured with seal and string. There was no indorsement upon it to give me any clue as to what it was. I unrolled it as I had done the others, and bewas no indorsement upon it to give me any clue ar to what it was. I unrolled it as I had done the others, and behold it was a plan of Woodleigh Grange, a very elaborate one too, whereon every room, passage and window was noted and described. From mere curriosity I began to examine it. I was astonished at the antiquity of the building. I found that the eastern and the estern wings had both been built during the reign of Charles I., ostensibly for increase of accommodation, but in reality the western wing was full of secret rassages and closed rooms that had been used to shelter Royalists in time of canger. There was one room in which Charles Stuart, the "Merrie Monarch," had lived for a whole month, while the soldiers of the Commonwealth were in hot pursuit after him. The louse had been searched while he was hidden securely in it. This room was called "King Charles" room," I wondered who the architect of the building was, for suything more skilfully contrived to me seemed impossible. thing more skilfully contrived to me rooms were all marked on the The rooms were all marked on the plan, together with the passages that led to them, and the way of opening the panels minutely described. I was engressed ni my discovery, and did not note how time slipped away. I hung over the plan until I believe I could have found my way blindfolded to any of the rooms in the western wing.

have found my way blindfolded to any of the rooms in the western wing.

The luncheon bell aroused me; I hastily tied up the roll again, and left it as I found it. I threw it among the papers on the floor; and it so happened that the next parchment I drew from the chest was the very deed for which I was searching. I had just began to replace the others, when Mr. Charlton entered the room. He thanked me very politely for my kindness, and was turning away with a smile on his face, when his eye fell upon the plan lying on the ground. He picked it up, and unrolled it.

"How on earth did this get here?" riow on earth did this get here: he cried. It thought it was destroyed."

"It is the plan of the Grange," I said, calmly; "if you have no objection, Mr. Charlton, I would like to carry it away and look over it at my leisure. I should feel so much interest in it.

"It is not accurate." he realist care.

"It is not accurate," he replied, con-sedly; "it is full of mistakes. There is another somewhere about that would interest you more."

I felt inclined to tell him that I had left inclined to tell him that I had looked it through, but it seemed useless to add to his annoyance. He quitted the room hurriedly, carrying with him the roll of parchment.

A week after that, Mr. Charlton summoned me

A week a moned me one morning to ference in the drawing-room. He said that it was time that I was informed of the contemplated changes in his establishment; that he hoped soon to be married, and there would be of course many alterations. He did not mention the lady's name, but he must have known from my intimacy with Blanche Carew that I was aware of all the facts of the case. He wished to know if I had any objections of going abroad, as he thought of living for a few years at least in Normandy.

"You will leave the Grange then?" I cried in surprise.

"Yes." he replied, vehemently: "I defectle and helploss every day, and something tells me I shall nove seems to grow more feedle and helploss every day, and something tells me I shall nove seems of the Mostvn again." And in one sense of the

"I have no reason for liking it," he answered, looking at me curiously.
"And none for leaving it?" I questioned, with a smile; and at my chance words I saw a strange look across his face, and I knew that in some way or other I had unwittingly displeased him.
"I am perhaps somewhat precipitate."

"All good families have ghosts, Mra. Furnival," I said. "I hear that you are honored with several at the Grange."
The politic touch about "good families" won the old lady's heart.
"Yes," she replied; "people tell strange stories about the rooms in the western wing, but for my part I don't believe them."
"What do your ghosts do?" I asked. "Do they carry chains, or spend their time in sighing; or do they walk, as legends tell us, with their heads under their arms?"
"I have heard strange noises," replied the old woman, gravely, "when I have passed through the long corridor there. I never laugh at ghosts myself, miss, she added reproachfully. "I don't understand them."
"Some day, when you are not busy.

derstand them."
"Some day, when you are not busy,
Mrs. Furnival," I asked, "will you take me over the western wing? I have a great curiosity to see those rooms."
"Why?" she asked sharply; and then I saw how foolish my remark was.
"Old houses interest me," I said. "I like going over them."
She made no reply, but directed my attention to some triumph of culinary art she had just completed for her mas;

Imagine my vexation when, a few days afterwards, I was sent for again to the drawing room, where Mr. Charlton asked me if I would object to go with Helena to Hastings for a month or two. He thought she did not look so well as usual, and the sea air would do her good.

her good.

I knew by instinct that the hopse I knew by instinct that the hopse-keeper had reported to her master my foolish expression of curiosity over the western wing. I felt convinced it was so, although he did not refer to it. I was obliged to say that I was quite willing to accompany Miss Charlton any-where, although I added that I really had not noticed any falling off in her health.

had not noticed any falling off in her health.

"You will be ready, if convenient, Miss Wood, in three days from now. I am going to London then on some busi-ness, and I can take you both down," was all Mr. Charlton's reply to my half protest protest.

Before this I had merely suspected a mystery; now I felt certain there was one, or why should the housekeeper have been so prompt to report my few one, or why should the housekeeper have been so prompt to report my few words? If the western wing had no secrets, why should I be sent to Hastings because I had expressed a wish to visit the rooms? Yet what could the whole affair be? Three people must know the secret, if there was one—Allan Charlton, his housekeeper, and the old Charlton, his housekeeper, and the ob-lurse. Perhaps it was nothing of im-portance after all.

CHAPTER IV.

CHAPTER IV.

Three weeks of the time given to Blanche Carew had elapsed. The change in her distressed me beyond words. She looked like a shadow of her brilliant and beautiful self. No gay words or happy smiles came now to those pale, silent lips. The girl looked as though her heart was breaking, and from hersad, joyless face I saw she was already ner neart was breaking, and from her-sad, joyless face I saw she was already deciding in her own mind to give up Hugh Mostyn. She made no more com-plaints to me; that one passionate burst of weeping was the last—at least in my presence. She did not even men-tion the subject which filled both our hearts. She looked hopeless and wretch-ed beyond words. I wondered whether thing tells me I shall never see Hugh Mostyn again." And in one sense of the word she never did.

All night these few pitiful words rang in my ears. This was Tuesday; we were to leave for Hastings on Thursday; and something told me that it was not intended for me to return to the Grange again.

"There me reason for like ing it."

"And note for leaving it?" I questioned, with a smile; and at my chance for leaving it?" I questioned, with a smile; and at my chance for feering it?" I questioned, with a smile; and at my chance for feering it? I questioned, with a smile; and at my chance for feering it? I questioned, with a smile; and at my chance for feering it? I questioned with a smile; and at my chance for feering it. The feering it is a smile for my country in the feering of the my country in the feering of the feeri stood open, showing an indescribable melange of crockery, glass and kitchen utensils—such was what met my eyes. The old woman emptied the contents of her basket upon the table; there were tea, bread, meat—provisions, in fact, enough to last her a week. To my surprise there were also two or three bottles
