Quite recently you referred to remarks in a speech by me at the Sea-men's Institute as "reading Sir Mi-chael out of the leadership." I reforred on that occasion to the matter of leadership at the approaching general election, with the knowledge that Sir Michael long ago declared his intention not to lead, and had privately told me so on several occasions. I take the opportunity of saying that the personal confidence I learned in 1919, as his colleague, to place in Sir Michael Cashin has not abated in the slightest degree, and that my friendship and admiration for him are strong indeed.
