Weekly Theatrical Letter

BY BRETT PAGE.

New York, June 19.—Lew Fields has returned to Broadway. He has come into his own again with "A Lonely Romeo," the newest and perhaps the funniest—most certainily the "dancingest"—of summer shows yet seen, Harry B. Smith and Lew Fields wrote the book, Mr. Smith produced the lyrics, and Malvin M. Franklin and Robert Hood Bowers contrived the music, which is at the Shubert Theatre, contains nearly seventy names upon its program and once more empikasizes the fact that Lew Fields is a comedian who occupies a niche peculiarly his own. These condensed statistics are necessarily swept out of the way in the very first paragraphs of this review to prepare for what should be very real appreciation of the show and especially of Lew Fields.

and takes place in the hat shop, although the act had opened at 4 a.m. in the Shimmering Pheasant Restaurant, with Lew Fields calling up his wife to explain just why he couldn't get home last night. A clever phonograph contrivance gives the replies that come over the telephone—the answers of his wife, his daughter, his son, even the protests of his dog. The second act is set in a candy shop. Under the influonce of marshmallow highballs, lollypop Bronxes, nougatine Manhattans and other pust-July consolers, there occurs a dancing scene of acrobatic marvels. Nellie and Willie St. Clair lead all save Lew Fields, who brings down the curtain and the house by a series of cartivation of the show and especially of Lew Fields.

day, and trips the light fantastic air day, and trips the light fantastic air night lone.

These are the ingredients that concoct what in other days might have been called "a laughter cocktail." But words cannot do more than suggest the coming results of Lew Fields' composite art. For instance, there's the scene in which he makes everyone feel it would be a tragedy beyond the telling if he didn't ragedy beyond the telling if he didn't ragedy beyond the telling if he didn't sell a customer a hat. But there isn't as hat that's too big, but even his thumb that that will fit. First Fields tries are taken down to make room for the too small. And then he takes the step too small. And then he takes the city of this "heady" customer with a machine that goes on nicely, but won't convent of. It's humorous even here, but it's excruciatingly funny as Lew Fields does it.

This is the fun climax of the first act, the converted the first night of the memory of the Newton that the first night of the play. Then there's a hat that's too big. For Lew Fields can extract humor, stringest fun and compel laughter from any scene he may be induced to play. This is evidenced in each of the three acts of "A Lonely Romeo," though the why of the title is obscure, but one must admit that it's a good title and perhaps that's all that was desired. A Romeo of an age that cannot be called young. Lew Fields impersonates a Fifth young. Lew Fields impersonates a Fifth business after his own funny fashion by day, and trips the light fantastic all night long.

ence entered the theatre. A court injunction had sustained the picture in its tenancy of the Harris Theatre.

Never before in the memory of the present chronicler has such a situation occurred. Its roots lie far back in the present season. From Selwyn & Co., who had the lease at the beginning of this season, Thomas Dixon rented the theatre. From him H. H. Moss took the unexpired lease. Then Mr. Moss rented the Harris to the picture people. He desired to terminate their lease to make room for Walter Lawrence and his play, but the picture owners declared thay were protected in their tenancy solong as the receipts from the picture did not fail below a certain figure.

And so—those who had come to see the play went home, and those who had come to see the play went home, and those who had arrived early to don their make-up in the dressing-rooms, left the dressing-rooms and went home. And—there are lots of other "ands"—at the moment of writing this strange tangle hasn't yet been untangled.

STARS FOR NEXT SEASON.

That next season should be at least a satisfactory reflection of the season just ended, is the emphatic opinion of A. H. Woods, who expresses it in plans the receipts form the picture of the desired to terminate their lease to the play went home, and those who had arrived early to don their make-up in the dressing-rooms, left the dressing-rooms and went home.
