HOW PICKLES LEARNED A LESSON. Perhaps they called him Pickles because he was such a sour-tempered dog. It was indeed a name that suited him—for nowhere could you have found a dog that was so mean.

It was too bad that Pickles was so mean, too, for he was a handsome dog with a jet black, glossy coat that must have been quite warm. He was a big dog, too—and oh, how flerce and strong he looked—though, to tell the truth, in side his heart he was a very cowardly dog.

og. Being a coward, Pickles greatly feared what a brave dog he was! He had fought wolves and jackals and coyotes and other fierce animals, Pickles had heard. Because all the other dogs admired Prince, the bad dog hated him. One day, however, poor Prince was sadly hurt in a fight with wolves in the woods. He had lost some of his teeth and had many cruel wounds. Then Prince took a fever that left him very weak and thin. His master feared that another fight with the wolves would and his pet's life, so he charmed Prince to the kernel in the yard. How Prince did fret at his chain, and how his spirits sank—he felt so miserable he became thinner and weaker than before.

Imagine bad Pickle's delight one day to the kennel in the yard. How Prince in such a sorry plight. How brave the bully felt when he saw the hero dog so humbled and so wretched-looking.—Pickles knew the chain held Prince was heady cut and scratched and he flustly selecting before a fire and feeling better for the first time for days. But he and go could see that the other dog was weak, but just the same he kept out of reach of Prince.

"So here you are Mr. Smarty," said "Pickles, he ridly. "Come out and fight me. Wha, a miserable looking wretch you are, na, na, "" Come out and fight me. Wha, a miserable looking wretch you are, na, na, "" RED AND WHITE."

What a thing it would be to be able to say that he had thrashed the best fighting dog in the country, he told himself. Even though he knew how weak Prince was, he feared to attack him in daylight, and so he went to the woods to wait until nightfall.

We looked up and beheld the small, stocky figure of the millionaire approaching us.

The latter wore a lonely, disconcerted sort of look. No doubt he had perceived fair Margery's absorption in the attractive Freddie—and was correspondingly lealous and upset.

Julie cleared her throat, so that each syllable would sound distinctly.

"I mean that he is hanging on at some rich woman's table, as is his usual game. He's played it very frequently, and nearly always with success. You don't find Freedie where there is no money. That's been my experience anyhow." She gave a short, grating laugh.

I grew hotter and hotter.

"Anne already knows my opinion of Delaunay." Neil's square jaw seemed to grow squarer as he spoke. His eyes snapped. "Neither of us has any use for him."

Julie smile an enigmatic smile.

"Take care, then, that he hasn't use for you! He's clever."

My husband did not answer. I was glad when the arrival of food caused a temporary distraction, and change of subject.

"I suppose there are some very pleasant people staying in the hotel?" proceeded the Frenchwoman, artlessly." "Have you made any new acquaintances? Or are you both too wrapt up in each other to notice humble earth-dwellers?"

Neil looked uneasy. He shot a glance at me.

Neil nodded.

I noticed the eager expression deepen in Julie's eyes.

"And he is paying attention to the pretty Miss Langhorne, is he?" Her tone was light. But I—who knew her—realized that she was now thoroughly interested in this only son.

Neil smiled rather foolishly.

"Oh, everyone pays attention to Margery, more or less. She's an attractive girl."

"Of course she is. It would be an excellent thing for herself—" She broke off, significantly.

My husband did not look entirely pleased with this frank hint.

Dear Miss Grey,—This is my first visit to the Mail-Box. I saw where Lassie has sent in the poem, "In Flanders Fields," and I should like it if you will send it to me. I have inclosed envelope with my address. I have a brother who sleeps somewhere in Flanders fields among the poppies, so that is why I should like the poem. I am sending a recipe for rheumatism; it may help some of the readers. My mother was very badly troubled with rheumatism and she used to take lodide of potash. She got it from a drug store and mixed it with water and took it as follows, two tablespoonfuls three times a day.
