Real sorrow is sober, its of different sizes.

I would like you to meditate, in deep universal brotherhood, on the meaning of these words.

First of all, they are not as simple as they appear to be, for it would seem that in uttering them the apostle was thinking of some men near at hand, who for the moment were neither rejoicing nor weeping, but who asked for nothing better than to do one or the other, according to whom they might they ong their fellow-men come across am through sympathy, through brotherly eling, through mutual understand ing. But we are not all of us in that ition, in fact, most of us are not That state, I will not say of indiffer-ence, but of harmony, in which all our A poet has said: forces are balanced, when we neither in grief nor in great joy, that state is not that of the majority of men. As a general rule, men are eithe sad or happy. It remains to be seen whether there are more in a state of happiness than sorrow, or more in state of sorrow than happiness. The enumeration is difficult to make. All that man feels in this respect he feels by direct impression and thanks to information he has gathered from within himself rather than around him. But, that problem laid aside, here i another that is far more practical. If, at the moment when you are joyful, some one who is sorrowful which of the two should carry out the mand given by the apostle? Shall the one who rejoices weep with the one who weeps, or shall the one who weeps with the one who rejoices?

I think that what is most human of things is exchange, and I recall at nent one of the finest poems this mo that have ever been written in any one of the simplest and at language the same time the most human. Noth ing is beautiful, nothing is permanent except those immortal co events that each day brings. In that poem two processions are described, meeting at a church. One is following the coffin of a child, the other is bringing a new-born babe to be christened two mothers meet, and the poet says:

It is probable that Collins, the suspected murderer of Miss Mcunion of all city corps was held this Aulay, will be take nto Albert county on the train which leaves the city shortly before noon today. Father McAulay, who is a well-pre served man somewhat over sixty years of age, is very much unnerved : t the terrible tragedy, and last night at the home of his relative, Mrs. Joshua Ward, refused to be seen or to make any statement. The reason for the delay of the sheriff and Father McAulay in reaching the city was Father McAulay's' church picnic, which was held Tuesday. It will be remembered it was while ar-ranging for this picnic that Father Mc-Aulay was away at the time of the murder. Father McAulay felt very anxious to be present and the sheriff therefore consented to remain over t the next day.

Since the tragedy Father McAula: has been much broken down and could hardly be persuaded to eat anything After his sad return home, Mrs. Chas Morris of Harvey, a relative, and neighbors stayed by the priest at his home.

Upon reaching the city Sheriff Lynds and Father McAulay went im mediately to see the attorney general, but they had only a short conversation with Dr. Pugsley. Both the sheriff and the priest will see the attorney general this morning.

Sheriff Lynds did not go to the Cen tral Police Station last night but will be an early visitor there this morning Sheriff Lynds says that the murder has caused the greatest interest in the county in which it was perpetrated. The general feeling seems to be that Collins is guilty. Speaking of the burglary which took place at Father McAulay's house a short time ago the sheriff said that there did not seem any reason to connect this with the murder. The sheriff is under the Impresion that Father McAulay is aware, or strongly suspects who it was that committee the robbery. The thief or thieves on this occasion made away with some of the wine which was kept for church
