ILLUSTRATED BY MANY PHOTOGRAPHS

Cloth, 12mo, $1.50

"The writer was 17 and a freshman at Princeton, but these are not merits in themselves. The gift of his youth is that he saw and told everything frankly without any of the acquired literary or temperamental pose. His view is as direct and healthy as the vision of a child, and his spirits are as sound as a cheerful schoolboy's. . . . It needs an intimately personal character, boyish and yet vivid and wide-awake, like this one, to show us what the war means to the lads and how little it dashes their fresh spirits." — The New York Sun.

"An account of the war as youth sees it, written in a studied, unsophisticated way that is most appealing. . . . The most moving of war books, unpretentious, vivid. So matter of fact is it in its simple telling of what soon appeared the natural thing in life to its writer, that the great impression given by the book is continually intensified and heightened." — The Princeton Alumni Weekly.

With the Flying Squadron

Illustrated, cloth, 12mo, $1.25

"A stirring narrative of adventure which gives the reader many a thrill and which shows an entirely new side of the war — distinctly new in that this is the first great conflict in which the aeroplane has played an important part. One does not see the horror of warfare in Mr. Rosher's writing, as the air-pilot is apparently further removed from scenes of bloodshed and carnage than other officers in the service; it is largely a feeling of exhilaration, of breathless daring which he experiences, and these characteristics are well imparted to the reader in Mr. Rosher's sketches." — Philadelphia Press.

"There is perhaps no book in the entire round of warlike publications which gives to the civilian so strong a sense of the utter recklessness of the assured certainty of the aviator's eventual fate. . . . There has been heretofore published no such ample, convincing portrayal of the life of an air-fighter as is disclosed in these letters. . . . Lieutenant Rosher's terse, dramatic letters vividly foreshadow the new period and method of warlike adventure."

"One of the most fascinating documents which the war has produced."

— Churchman.
