Such is a very abridged version of the "Legend of Saint Patrick's Hand." and it was recalled to our memory by the ludicrions finale of the battle about the Rebellion Losses Bill. After the almost ananimous decision of the British Parlitment on the subject, the Transcript, and a few other journals, conducted with more brains than the rest of the Tory Press, saw that the sooner They, therefore, made the best of a bad we ket and claimed a victory, declaring that week.

A few of the liberal journals contradicted these views and sentiments, and seemed desirous of producing a second contest on the the conduct of the Irish enthusiasts. For while the Indernity Bill, in the very same form and words in which it was introduced, is now recorded in the Statute Book, and like St. Patrick's hand, can be pointed to as a tangible proof of the victory, all farther disputing of the question is superfluous, if not positively ridiculous. For our own part, we were rather pleased than otherwise with the subtile policy of the Transcript; for however much we may despise shamwork, we think that when men have been duped into the vortex of rebellion and violence, there is a kind of a half-virtuous intention in endeavor-ing to dupe them out of it. Hence, so long as-the Indemnity Bill in its orginal form remains in the Statute Book, and is fully carried into have obtained a victory !

But the most amusing act in the whole Tory drama is the comments of the Press on the proceedings of the "Convention." We are inclined to be merry at times, and though during the soul, last six months, we have often been out of temper and compelled to write bisterly against the strageous articles of the Tory Editors, yet we almost feel disposed to forgive them; for we must admis that they have afforded us more merriment, since the mock Parliament in Kingston, than we season than for many years past.
