Crawford, the scuptlor; Vincent Wallace, the composer; John Roach, the shipbuilder.

The highest but one in rank in our army is Irish, and the second in command in our navy, Rowan, is a native of Ireland, as is the first in command. Porter, the descendant of an Irishman. The greatest British panter was Irish; the greatest British philosopher, Robers Boyle, was Irish; the greatest British naturalist, Hans Sloane, was Irish. John Tyndall is not a British scientist, but an Irish naturalist, Hans Sloane, was Irish. John Tyndall is not a British scientist, but an Irish scientist in Britain. Spranger Barry is an Irish tragedian entertaining British with Irish plays. It was an Irishman, John Knox, that first read the Declaration of Independence. John Dunlap, an Irishman, first published that declaration, and the same John Dunlap first printed and published the first daily paper in the United States. An Irishman wrote the first history of the United States: John Sullivan "fired the first shot at the King's power;" John Bay, an Irishman, was the first commander of the American Navy. An Irishman, Gen. Richard Montgomery, fell while commanding an American army and fighting for American independence. Henry Knox, an Irishman, found first Secretary of War.

The Demosthenes of the Revolution, with Washington, and was the first Secretary of War.

The Demosthenes of the Revolution, Patrick Henry, was Irish. Then may glory be around the graves of the Knoxes, Clintons, Butlers, Irvings, Haads, Starks, Moylands, Thompsons, Sullivans, Montgomerys and Waynes, whose Irish swords flashed brightest in the contest that won American independence: and brights be the light that clusters around the solitary ray of English patriotism that glistened on the blade of Yates, McClellan, McPherson, Cook, famous Phil Kearny, Lee, Jackson, Scott, Glebourne, McDowell, Rowan, Porter, Shields and Logan are all Celts, and why not pay a passing tribute to our own Irish hero of Winchester Phil Sheridan? We, the people of the United States, are said to be Anglo-Saxon. We are not, but are in a truer sense of Celtic extraction. The great branch of the Anglo-Saxon amounts to no more than 5,000,000. The Celt element is 30,000,000. Of the thirty-nine States and eleven Territories more than thirty were settled by France and Spain. Nor were the original thirteen States settled by Saxons. These are historical facts, and yet Prof. Goldwin Smith quarrels with Home Rule and the conduct of the members of the House of Comraons. To be brief, these same members are admitted to be the brightest set of legislators in the world, but Mr. Smith says that, although they legislate for England, they are unequal to the task of legislating for freland.

Literature for Tectotallers. From The Philadelphia Times.

A society of Scottish scholars are now engaged in the preparation of an edition of the poets, in which all allusions to alcohol are to be carefully suppressed. In their new editions, Burns, it is said, will lose nearly all his holiest lyrics, and scores of other Scotch poets, to whom the praise of whisky has been poets, to whom the praise of whisky has been what that of wine was to Anacreon, will find their best pararraphs depleted. "A teetotal edition of the poets of all ages," says the London Telegraph, "would be a curious sight. Anacreon would almost disappear. Some of the most striking scenes of Homer and Virgil, from banquets of the gods to heroes feasts, must be cut out. Horace would not be allowed to praise the Falernian, which must have been better than its modern namesake to justify his enthusiasm. English literature is also full of lyrical outbursts in eulogy of drinking. One of Shakespeare's plays hinges on Cassio quarreling in his cups, and the murder of Duncan is made easy by the drunkenness of the grooms. The expurgation must even go higher than Homer or Shakespeare; it must touch the sacred book itself, refuse to record the miracle at the marriage of Cana, and blot out the Psalmist's allusion to wine that maketh glad the heart of man."

"Arnold is dead," said Mr. Jones at the breakfast table, laying down the morning paper and sipping his coffee.
"He is dead, is he?" said Mrs. Jones, "Died

"Yes, he died in England."
"I knew he went there right after trying to betray his country," said Mrs. Jones, reflectively. "Pity they hadn't caught him instead of that poor Major Andre. He lived a long while, pears to me."
"Why who are you talking about?"
"Arnold—Benedict Arnold."
"You're way off, mother. That Arnold has been dead over ninety years. This is Arnold, the English author."
