Pan-American Statesmanship.

This is the beginning of the twentieth century. Pan-Americanism is the vogue.

A congress of the American republics is to be held next fall in Mexico. It is expected that the principle of international arbitration will be adopted by the congress and a basis laid for permanent peace among the countries of the two American continents.

The new century opens auspiciously. There may be war among the nations of Europe, but Pan-Americanism will triumph and ensure the peace of the republics of North and South America. This, at least, is the idea that prevails in the United States. That country leads the world in the movement for international arbitration, and as it is the leading power in the two Americas its adoption of the principle of arbitration will go a long way towards making it the ground work of Pan-Americanism.

Canada has long been a champion of the principle of arbitration and honestly lives up to it. Canada believes in arbitration, which we use as a synonym for the American continent.

Pan-Americanism ought to supplant the Monroe doctrine. That doctrine, as a matter of fact, has become obsolete. It, indeed, it ever had any real existence. The Monroe doctrine had application to but a single American country, the United States.

United States. Pan-Americanism covers the whole of North and South America. It works for the peace and advancement of the whole western hemisphere. We in Canada would like to see lasting peace established between the nations of this continent. We would like to see a healthy movement in that direction set going during this auspicious year. For our own part, we are prepared to go even further along the line of progress than has been suggested by the United States for the Pan-American states.

We would like to see the opening of the new century made the occasion of a new clearing-up of all the old and ends, the anglicisms, as it were, that may cause friction between the nations of North and South America.
