SEES NEW FLIGHT ERA IN HUGE OIL ENGINE

British Expert Says Air Ministry's Latest Development Will Cheapen Air Transport.

London, Sept. 19.—A promise of astonishing developments in cheap transport in air is held out by a new oil engine for flying machines evolved secretly after long research by a famous aeronautical firm in conjunction with the British Air Ministry. The engine will soon undergo tests in the air. It is said to be no heavier than a gasoline airplane engine and to burn crude oil, a fuel whose cost is not more than half that of first grade gasoline.

The Daily Chronicle's aeronautical correspondent says the engine is a six-cylinder monster, developing 750 horsepower. He writes:

"The navigation of the air in huge, long-lived winged ships of metal driven by these big, staunch, simple, enduring engines, which burn crude oil, promises not only a great new epoch of speed, but also of cheapness of transport. These great oil engines of the air, soon to be seen developing thousands rather than hundreds of horsepower, not only employ this cheap form of fuel, but will actually use, when in the air on long range flights, appreciably less of it than does the ordinary aeroengine of its expensive petrol fuel. In immensely long flights, therefore, either for reconnaissance, bombing or fighting, the oil-engine aerial cruiser or battleship will have a tremendous advantage over machines which have no such perfected simplified power plant. Their radius of action will be widened, their striking power increased, and the 'air arm' endowed with a significance greater even than it possesses now."
