THE IMPOSSIBLE.

I cannot talk worth fourteen cents, and so no spiels I spring; and much I envy gifted gents who make the welkin ring. Chautauqua magnates ply their game, and promise bundles fine, if I'll but write my moral name upon the dotted line. And often I am tempted sore; then I hear Conscience say, "What right have you, I ask, to bore an audience for pay? You know that every time you've tried to paint the welkin red, a lot of wilted eggs were shied, in anger, at your head." How much of boredom we'd avoid, how much of language blue, if fewer fellows were employed at work they cannot do! I'm weary of that singer's screech who knocks the notes to pulp; I'm tired of hearing blacksmiths preach, and seeing farmers sculp. I'm glad that I have sense enough to know where I'm a frost, and so I dodge the platform stuff, it ough at a frightful cost; for there the easy money lies, and there the soft snays grow; the country's full of taking guys who trade hot air for dough. But as a speaker I am tough, which cannot be denied; I'm glad that I have sense enough to let the welkin slide.

of these, said Mrs. Clark, were dismissed from the Island, most of them on their own recognizance when this country entered the war, in order to make room for Germans at the immigration detention station. Few of them, if any, she believes, have been deported since that time, and they are still at large in this country."

Of the result of indifference in regard to this matter, Mrs. Clark says:—

"Were it just that these people, and the thousands who are being admitted now, become public charges, the problem would not be so serious. The financial burden, while unnecessary, could be borne by the state without much trouble. But when I think of these mentally defective thousands becoming progenitors of persons just as incompetent, and cometimes more so, it stargers me.

Now, for a brief time, we shall have the wireless telephone as the wonder of wonders in the transmission of intelligence by the reproduction of sound. Attention has been centred on it by the announcement that words spoken by a man in England have been heard in Newfoundland, more than 2,000 miles away. The wireless telephone is not new, but it has heretofore been used for communicating over distances comparatively short. Ships of the navy have been equipped with the necessary devices for telephoning without wires and have put them to practical use. But it needed something in the nature of transoceanic communication to establish the wireless telephone as the contemporary wonder.

It has attained that position, but it it has attained that position, but it it is a static to the position of the past, which have so often made easy things before regarded as impossible.
