LINES IN A SON'S BIBLE.
Remember, love, who gave thee this,
When other days shall come—
When she who had thy earliest kiss,
Sleeps in her narrow home.
Remember I, too, a mother gave
This gift to one she'd die to save.
That mother sought a pledge of love,
That I, too, sought a mother's love,
And from the gift of God above,
She chose for me a goodly one;
She chose for her beloved boy,
The source of life and light of joy.
And while his life kept the gift that when
The parting hour shall come,
They may not see her face again,
In her eternal home.
She said his faith in that would be
Sweet income to her memory.
And should the suffer in his pride,
Lament that could not be,
And bid him not that gift to lose,
That he who gave it to me,
She bids him pause and ask his breast,
If he, or she, had loved him best?
A parent's blessing on her son
Goes with this holy thing,
The love that would retain the one
Must to the other cling.
Remember, love, the gift that I
Received from my mother's hand,
THE CONFESSION.
[Found among the papers of a deceased Prussian Judge.]
This is my last night—and standing as I do on the brink of eternity, I will fill up the few hours that intervene before my extinction takes place, in writing down the history of my progress in crime, and how step by step I reached this dangerous May, it be accepted as an act of atonement on my part, and at the same time act as a warning to others.
I was a forward child, of a sultry, suspicious character, and I afterwards became a rough, slow, and ungovernable man. I was the cause of which, people having succeeded to war, I left the service to form a small estate which my wife had inherited. Soon after my return from the army, my brother sickened and died. He was an open hearted, kind fellow, far better looking than my self, and universally beloved. All those who were acquainted with him, whether at home or abroad, from being his friends, fellow took kindly to me, and generally observed the first time they saw me, that never were two brothers more unlike, both in person and manners.
We had married two sisters, and this circumstance which ought to have been an additional bond between me, only constructed to estrange us still more. His wife was through my character but too well, and I always felt, whenever I gave way to any ill impulse of envy or hatred in her presence, as if she were a thorn in my eye, and a nail in my heel.
It was a relief to me when the coolness between us ended in an open rupture, and still a greater relief when I received the news of her death, while I was with my regiment abroad. It now seems to me as though I had a presentiment of the frightful tragedy that was to take place—I trembled, and she seemed to pursue me—ever now I see her reproachful face glaring upon me, and freezing up my blood. She died shortly after giving birth to a child. When my brother-in-law died, he bequeathed all his property to me, leaving in his will that should the child die, his fortune was to devolve on my wife, as the end return he could make for her affectionate kindness. Then, after exchanging a few fraternal remarks with my wife, and regarding her as estranged, he fell back exhausted, into a deep slumber, from which he never awoke.
As we had no children, and the two sisters had always been very united, my wife loved this boy as if he had been her own. He was passionately fond of her, but being the true picture of his mother, both in mind and person, he could not remember her kindly to me, I cannot say any particular period at which I first became aware of this kind of antipathy on his part, but I soon began to feel uneasy whenever he was present. He often as I awoke out of a train of gloomy thoughts, there was that child staring at me, not with the smiling gaze of childhood, but with a stern, unfeeling, and unkindly look, that used to annoy me in his mother. It was not merely an empty fancy of mine, attributable to his strange likeness to my deceased parent, for I had seen him stare like that, and look at me as if I might have been evidently afraid of me, in which of which he seemed to have imbibed an hereditary contempt for me.
I may deceive myself—and yet I do not think that I intended at that period to do him any harm. It might, perhaps, seem to me how advantageous it would be for me to inherit the boy's property, and I might secretly wish him to die, still I do not think I had the least idea of taking away his life. The idea came very slowly at the first, and merely in the dim and distant outline, in which we see a vision of an impending earthquake, or the Day of the Last Judgment. Then it approached nearer and nearer, and began to assume a more definite shape, it became the constant theme of my speculations. When these four phantasms crossed my mind, I could not but see that the boy should survive I was staring at him, yet, by a kind of fascination, I could not help going on his fragile form, and thinking how easy the work of destruction would be. Sometimes I watched him in his sleep, but when still from the garden, as I leached behind the bushes, glancing like a tiger on his prey into the parlor, where he usually sat leaning his knees on a low stool beside my wife's knee.
I was not content with a deep pool, but it was not visible from our windows. I had several days in carving the rough model of a boat with my pen-knife, and when it was completed, I purposely left it in the child's way. I then hid myself near the pool in a spot that was not visible, in case he came out to the little toy when on the water. But he came neither on that nor the following day. Still I felt certain he was in my parlor, for I had heard him play about his toy, which he had even taken off to bed with him. I waited patiently, and on the third day, I could see him, from my hiding place, come running a long way, with his silver balls streaming in the wind, and singing "poor child"—a very merry tune, though he could scarcely play the words. I stole behind him, behind him, behind him, behind him, and the Bell One knows how I, a strong grown man, trembled in every limb as I followed the footsteps of this little child, while he approached the water's brink. I was alone behind him, crouching on my knees, and was raising my hand to push him in, when he saw my shadow on the water and turned round.
The sun now burnt fast from behind a cloud, turning the water into a sheet of molten gold. Everything sparkled as if all nature had eyes. I don't know what the boy said—though so young he did not seem upon me, nor try to swim; but all I recollect was, that he screamed out, not that he loved me, but that I would try to love me, and then he ran back to the house.
The next day I saw him, my sword was in my hand, and he was lying stiff and cold at my feet. I took him up in my arms and laid him gently in
