CHAPTER XXXI.

EVIL NEWS FROM SCOTLAND—EDWIN AND BITCHIE IN DEEP DISTRESS.

If, that night, something had not come as a diversion, the intensity of their anguish would have overwhelmed them. But something did come, end it brought a train of incidents and events, which concentrated in interest upon their own concerns—revolving also with a rapidity which left—no time for brooding reflections.

which left no time for broughly refrections.

At midnight the startling sound of the blowing of trumpets heralded what was to prove the bloodiest and most decisive battle of the war. Both sides knew quite well that this would be so, and Prussians and French were putting forth every possible exertion each to gain the victory for their own side.

If the French gained it, then Bazaine would be able to unite his army with that of MacMahon; if he lost, he would be driven into Metz, and there invested, shut appraised in the startlength of the st render.

The Prussians, on the other hand, were fully aware of the momentous consequences involved, and the supreme inportance to them of gaining the victory, and they were gathering their vast hosts from every available point to secure the object.

from every available point to secure the object.

Edwin had a full knowledge of the state of the case, for in the morning Hermann had told him—only he did not expect that the battle would take place till the second day following.

At midnight, however, as we have said, the silence was broken by the sounding of trumpets along all the line, which extended for several miles upon the heights which fronted the town of Gerse, and the tramp and march of troops through the town were incessantly maintained till dawn.

As soon as the first streaks of light which fronted the town of Grore, and the tramp and march of troops through the town were incessantly maintained till dawn.

As soon as the first stryaks of light came out of the east, Edwin and Richies Structed for the front to tearn what was going to the control of the cast, Edwin and Richies Structed for the front to the lattle had begun, for there reached them through the grow hull picrossing light that horrid roar which they had learned to well to understand—the combined roar of artillery, change they had learned to well to understand—the combined roar of artillery, change they had learned to well to understand—the combined roar of artillery, change they had learned to well to understand—the combined roar of artillery, change they had learned to well to understand—the combined roar of artillery, change they had been they had been perfectly the strike of human life literary appalling.

The two onloosers, ever anxious for Hermann's safety, herosated the sign beyond the town, and reached the high and woulded men — no time haring yet been had to bury the corpses and remove the moaning sulferes to the hory ideal.

It was sever this glassely spot as full of indescribable horrors and its grounds, that they had to pass, and selections, that they had to pass, and sulfation they have been been as the selection of the new battlefield, they were still surrounded by them, and did not reached the high and they have been the selection of the new battlefield, they were still surrounded by them, and did not reached the high and the selection of the new battlefield, they were still surrounded by them, and did not reached the high and the selection of the new battlefield, they were still surrounded by them, and did not reached the high and the selection of the new battlefield, they were still surrounded by them, and did not reached the high and the selection of the new battlefield, they were still surrounded by the selection of the selection of the command of a far prospect, and a full view of the catendary the selection of t

the manger of Bethlehen, "Glory to God in the highest, peace on earth, good will to men." Eighteen hundred years had rolled away since the celestial choir had ravished with their heavenly authem the cars of the listening shepherds; yet there, on these Alsatian heights and plains, the demon of war was raging with a fireconess and intensity never surpassed in the long history of human discord.
