Presently, however, he followed her, more to get a last word and smile from her than for anything else.

"You did not tell me what I should do for you," he said, a tell-tale tenderness in his tone, as he went to her side.

She was standing by a window quite near the door, and she was looking parwrapper of plain blue challie, confined at the waist by a massive silken cord of the same color, from which depended two massive tassels.

Her golden hair lay in careless rings on the white forehead, a delicate bloom was on her cheeks, and her lips were of a vivid scarlet.

For a moment a feeling of dismay came over Agnes.

His old-fashioned apparel would cerminly be very conspicuous in Mrs. Remington's elegant rooms, and among the bon ton of Chicago.

The next instant she looked bravely and steadfastly into his eyes.

"I do not think I could be ashamed of a friend under any circumstances," she said, with an earnestness that left no room for doubt of her sincerity.

"Do you consider me a friend?" he asked.

Why, certainly I do, Mr. Archibald, and a very good one, too."

"Well-then—I believe I'll come," he said, but still watching her closely to see if the would shrink in the least from the ordeal to which he was subjecting her. She did not. She simply said:

"Then I may take your acceptance to Mrs. Remington?"

"I reckon so; I'm not accustomed to rackets of that kind, and I'm afraid I'll teel like a cat in a strange garret; but I've some curiosity to see a little of upper-tendom for once in my life, and so I'll be on hand next Tuesday night."

"I am sure Mrs. Remington will give you a cordial greeting, and I will try to make you enjoy yourself, sir," Agnes responded, smiling, and wondering what fastidious Miss Pomeroy would say to see such a specimen and antediluvianism in Mrs. Remington's elegant drawingroom, or what that lady herself would bay to having her fashionable reception termed a "racket."

CHAPTER XV.

Agnes settled the perplexing question of dress long before Max returned. Her graduating dress, which was a white cashmere very simply made, had never been worn since that occasion. It was, therefore quite fresh, and both she and her mother concluded that, with a little alteration and some additions in the way of trimmings, it would do very nicely for the forthcoming reception, although they were well aware that it would not compare with the elegant costumes that would doubtless do honor to the occasion. CHAPTER XV.

the occasion.

With this important matter decided,
Agnes threw it entirely off her mind, and was prepared to thoroughly enjoy the spin with Max along the lake road.

He brought her back to his mother about noon with a color in her cheeks and a light in her eyes which told Mrs.
Remington that fear had had no place in her thoughts; while Max's manner betrayed more than he was aware of;
there was a happy confidence about him there was a happy confidence about hi which showed that some sweet hope for the future had taken root in his heart. Laura marked it instantly, and a deeper hatred of her fair rival took possession of her, while the look of sweet content that shone in Agnes' dark blue eyes galled her almost beyond endurance.

"Our white-faced saint doubtless imagines that she is playing her cards very skillfully," she sneered to herself. "She probably contemplates shining in Chicago society at no distant day as Mrs. Max Remington; but"—a cruel gleam leaping "she will find herself mis-

Perhaps however, she anticipates becoming Joseph Archibald Trowbridge's heiress. Well—ha! ha!—she will be welcome to that beggarly inheritance. I should just like to peep inside their rooms to see how they are fixed. I'll warrant everything is as stiff and old-fashioned as the man himself."

The next few days passed quickly and very pleasantly. There was some place to go every day—the theater or opera to attend, or callers to entertain, every evening and the eventful Tuesday came Collars and Character.

[Pall Mall Gazette.] In the frequent proclamation of the man by his apparel, a man's shirt collar takes a very decided part. A man does not clothe his neck with a collar of a particular shape merely because that particular shape suits the conformation of his neck. You see men with long necks who affect collars turned down to their shoulder blades. You also see men of apoplectic diathesis, and with no necks at all to speak of, who strangle themselves in tight all-rounders. Why should the one cultivate an uncalled-for decollete appearance, and the other exhibit equally uncalled-for "collar-head"? It is their individual way of proclaiming themselves, I take it. You could hardly imagine Mr. Balfour, for instance, in an all-rounder; and Mr. Chamberlain would be unrecognizable in the latest phase of neckwear known as the Toby collar. This is an adaptation for children of a larger growth, of the more expansive collar you see displayed over the jacket of a lower form boy. It is much in favor, I observe, with undergraduate youth, and may be taken to proclaim them. M. Rostand and a certain school of French playwrights affect the collar of their grandfathers, who turned down its points over the cascade of a tremendous black satin cravat. For advertisement purposes, the Rostand collar may be recommendno doubt, but it is a difficult to conceive that anyone would mount it for any other purpose. Still the ways of collar wearers are not always to be thus explained. At least, when you behold a man seated opposite opposite you at dinner in a collar with the points carefully arranged so as to catch the angle of his jaw whenever he moves his head a hair's breadth out of the straight line, and to bring tears into his eyes, should he happen to disremember, you can hardly suppose that that he wears that collar for the purpose of proclaiming himself of weak
