In our late advices we have expressed the pinion that the various influences favoring the opinion that the various instances a laveling the value of securities would probably begin to show their effect during the latter part of this month or the first half of January. The course of the market during the past week indicates that such a movement is probably now setting in. There a movement is probably now setting in. There has been a steady gain in activity and nearly every stock on the list has shown more or less improvement in price. Towards the close there was naturally some realizing owing to the Intervention of the holidays and the prospect of a bruken week following, but there appears to be more than one buyer to each seller, and the tone of the market is decidedly strong. In the bond market there is considerable buying in anticipation of the investment demand to be forthcoming on the payment of January interest and dividends, and the one-considerable buying in anticipation of the invest-ment demand to be forthcoming on the payment of January interest and dividends, and the quo-nations for mortgages continue to show an up-ward movement, which is usually the precursor of a rise in stocks. Although, ordinarily, the close of the year is attended with a good deal of postponement of speculative buying, yet this year the expectation of a January rise being unusually sanguine, it is not improbable that the closing week of 1891 may prove an active one.
