as a Christian, and she was sincere. Those who knew her best, can best give witness how faithfully and habitually she embodied her knowledge, and her principles, and her hope as a Christian, into her life and deportment, her daily walk and conversation. I firmly believe she was a Christian in heart and habit, in sentiment and conduct, through the whole of life. No one knows better than myself, except the partner of her joys and cares, how conscientious and faithful and earnest, she was in the discharge of her spiritual duties, how active and assiduous in the care of her family, in giving counsel to its members, and in doing good to all with unaffected kindness, as she had opportunity. To act in all things on principle, and that of the highest and purest description, appeared to be her constant aim; and, judging from her conduct, this which formed her aim, was in no common degree her attainment. How pleasing, then, to me, to say unto you all, here is a character worthy of imitation, exhibiting the virtues and graces of the Christian life. Never was minister favored with a more faithful friend or a more devoted member of his church, and to her frequently have I been indebted for any encouragement that I have received in the labors of my office, and which is so highly prized by every minister of the gospel. She was an ornament to my church, a most exemplary member of my flock—one, whose place in the house of prayer was never empty, unless prevented by the Providence of God. Oh, brethren, how many are there, who now hear me, of whom the same could be said when you come to die. Remember that a well-spent life brings its own reward, “for the memory of the just is blessed.” Her sickness was short—disease came insidiously upon her, and quickly prostrated every power of mind and body. It was of little avail that we invited the sleeper to unite with us at a throne of grace; the torpor of disease was too deep to permit even a momentary consciousness; the ear could no longer distinguish as it had been wont the accents of divine love: faith had lost
