FITTINGLY OBSERVED AT WELLINGTON ST.

Pastor Says Every Bloom Has Message for People.

"There are it is said. 100,000 different kinds of flowers, and each one has a message for us," declared Rev. My J. Ashton B.D., at the Wellington Street Methodist Church Sunday morning, the occasion being the annual celebration of flower day in that church. Flowers of many varieties were arranged around the pulpit, and the boys and girls of the congregation, to whom a special invitation had been extended, occupied the front pews of the church. Continuing, he said that just as there continuing, he said that just as there were thousands of varieties of flowers, there were thousands of varieties of boys and girls, and that people foolishly expected that they should all act exactly the same. Every boy and girl was different in looks, and in disposition, from the others, and should be regarded as such. regarded as such.

regarded as such.

Wonderful Superiority.

The stronger the magnifying glass through which a beautiful garmen was examined, the coarser the cloth appeared, but the stronger the glass through which a flower was seen the more beautiful it became, which indicated the wonderful superiority of God's work over man's work.

All the beautiful flowers in the gardens were the result of cultivation, as once all were wild flowers. The chrysanthemum was developed from a wild Japanese shrub. It required time, patience and love to develop them from their wild state. "Where do we get the beautiful characters that we find among the men and women of today?" asked the speaker. "They are the result of the time, patience and love of parents and teachers that watched over and took care of you. Somebody saw something in you when you were young and wilful, and coaxed and cultivated the good in you, and developed you. Let us thank God for the work kind of people we are if we were brought up in rough houses without pictures. Flowers, like pictures in the nome, make us more refined and noble, and the children would be better if we had more flowers in the home, on account of their refining influence. The world is a nicer place to live in because of flowers. God is everywhere, and he shows himself in the grass and in the flowers. There is no monopoly of them, they are in the garden and along the wayside. God is eaking to us everywhere, by His B. Clarke
