MARJORIE CORTLAND ON "STATURE"
There are a good many actresses who have attained success thru the good fortune of a stature—either large or small—which will fit into parts most suitable to them otherwise. Most of them, therefore, are extremely grateful that they were endowed either with corpulence or were just low and slim, which ever the case might be. But there is no gratitude in the heart of little Miss Cortland, who will be seen at the Grand in the Margaret May comedy "Baby Mine," due to the fact that she grew up small and dainty. "No sir-e-e," Miss Cortland says, "it might be all right for Billie Burke to be small, or Trixie Friganza to be overly large, and for both of them to be thankful for the stature bestowed upon them." But as for her, she prefers—well, just read yourself what she says about it.
"I just hate being little," she exclaimed. "If I would like to be twice as big as I am—yes, fatter than Walter Jones, and as tall as, let me see, well, say Eddie Foy. Then I could look down on people just as they look down on me. It is simply awful to be small. You can realize that yourself when you know that I find satisfaction in standing on a chair and absolute consolation in sitting on the top of a step-ladder.
"Big women can buy pretty things to wear without going to all the trouble of having them made to order. You can't appreciate how much this means. I often walk down the street and see the prettiest things in shop windows.
"Then, on account of past experiences and hoping against hope I enter-ly run thru the stock, and see if some-where, tucked away, he can't find something that will fit me.
"But they invariably shake their heads, smile good-naturedly, look down on me, and tell me that I am too small; that I will have to have them made to order. That's the way with everything made to order. Gloves, shoes, and dresses. And then, after I have had them made to order, what is the result?
"Just this: In my estimation, modern clothes are all designed for the purpose of large women to look small. As a result, when I have my nice new up-to-date toggery. If they would only come back to the costumes of ancient Greece—flowing robes, sandals, and all sorts of things—how happy I would be."
