

is confronted in the light - "the terrible light", as Mr. Attlee said - of the implications of the development of atomic energy, the harder it is to see a solution in anything short of some surrender of national sovereignty.

With
~~some~~ a limited surrender of national sovereignty, there must ~~be instituted~~ some form of world government restricted, at least at the outset, to matters pertaining to the prevention of war, and the maintenance of international security.

The United Nations Organization is not a sufficient answer to the problems of peace and security which the world is now seeking. It is a first step, and an all-important step, in the direction of that co-operation between nations which is essential to the survival of civilization. It is not, however, the only, much less the final, step. The United Nations Organization is an indispensable medium and channel and forum through which the peoples of the world can work out new institutions and arrangements which their peace and security now require.

We do well to recall that the United Nations Charter had been signed before the world knew of the existence of the atomic bomb, much less anything about its ghastly military potentialities for mass destruction. The coming of the atomic bomb has opened our eyes to the
