In originality of conception and ingenuity of execution, the escape of Prince Krapotkin from the prison of days. the Nikolaievsk Military Hospital in St. Petersburg in 1876 is probably unparalleled in prison annals. Twelve conspirators outside the prison took part in it, but not one of them was ever arrested or suspected, although many of them were subsequently banished to Siberia for other political offences. The escape was made in broad day.

light, about five o'clock in the afternoon, and with such novel accessories as cherries, opera hats, music, a black mare, and a microscope. The chances were at least ten to one that it would fail, notwithstanding the extraordinary ingenuity with which it was planned, but every device and strategem worked perfectly, and the liberated prisoner dined that night in Donon's restaurant, the most fashionable of the capital, while the entire police force of the capital was ransacking the city in search of him.

Nobody ever imagined that he would be shrewd and bold enough to take his dinner in so public a place, and not a single detective looked for him there, although search was made in scorces of other places, and every exit from the city was so carefully guarded that a mouse could hardly have crept through unobserved .- The "Century."
