CHAPTER XXXIII.

AMONG PIRATES.
The heart of William Denman sank within him when he saw the boat shoot away from beneath him and he found himself struggling in the seething waters. Instinctively he tried to swim, but he was whirled and fro, and rose and fell in the heaving surge with a sickening and bewildering rapidity. His consciousness, however, remained with him, and managing to keep himself afloat he fixed his eyes on the only visible object—the burning ship—the flames of which now rose high in the air, and cast a red brilliant glare far over the sea. The lurid light revealed in all its horror the terribleness of his situation—the mighty billows dashing to and fro, and no help near. The youth's brave, manly soul resigned itself to the fate which he supposed was inevitable, and, convinced of the folly of protracting his agony by keeping afloat, he had just resolved to close his eyes, murmur a last prayer to Heaven, and end the hopeless struggle by sinking down into the depths, when a dark object appeared by his side. Something took hold of him, and he felt his head supported on the surface.

Opening his eyes in wonder, he encountered the bright orbs of Bree, gazing eloquently into his face. Till that moment the dog had been forgotten; but here was the faithful animal by his master's side, and making gallant efforts to preserve his life.

To Bree the heaving of the waters was as nothing. He seemed exactly in his element, and by the bright glance of his eye he was striving as plainly as words could utter it, to give courage and confidence to his master, and to assure him that all was not lost yet.

The sight of the noble animal, and the feeling of his sustaining strength, revived William in a moment, roused him from despair, and inspired him anew with hope. He abandoned his intention of quietly yielding to his fate, and threw one arm round the dog's body, by which means he could easily hold his head above the water, and use the other arm for swimming, so as to assist the dog's exertions.

This was evidently just what Bree wanted, for, with a proud, satisfied look, he struck out in a particular direction, and, in spite of the rolling of the waves, he kept his head steadily towards one point.

William resigned himself implicitly to the dog's guidance.

The burning ship still blazed brightly, and William eagerly looked in all directions over the illuminated water in the hope of seeing one of the boats. At length, to his intense joy, he beheld one, and that at no great distance. Bree must have known it was there, for he was making directly towards it. William, collecting his breath, gave one loud, prolonged shout, which rose above the roar of the sea, and was heard by those in the boat. William knew he was seen from the answering shout which burst from those on board. It was the little skiff containing Robert, Watty, and Ben. Every effort was made to turn the boat towards where the youth and his rescuer were battling gallantly with the waves, but they had little or no control over the vessel, which carried it hither and thither with a force and rapidity which bade defiance to their feeble strength.

The anguish and suspense suffered by those in the boat were dreadful to endure. Already they had given William up for lost, when they saw him drop into the sea, and great was their joy when they heard him cry, and saw him in the water supported by Bree. But now it seemed as if he was to perish still, and that before their very eyes. Hope had gone from every one but Bree, but he continued to cleave the waters patiently and steadily. He had his eye fixed firmly on the boat, and ever as it shifted he changed his course to where it had gone, while his strong limbs seemed fresh and unwearied as ever. For fully ten minutes they had been baffled in their efforts to meet, and one tremendous billow had come, casting them further apart than they had yet been. A deep groan burst from every heart, and the conviction was forced upon them that the rescue of William was impossible. But hardly was the despairing thought formed in their minds when another mighty wave came from behind, and carried the boat right on to where the youth and the dog were floating. As they were shooting past, Robert made a dart forward, and clutched Bree's shaggy back. In his headlong haste he would have shot over the side of the boat had not Watty seen the danger and flung himself in the bottom of the skiff, where he grasped Robert's leg and held fast.

William grasped the gunwale, and Robert's arms were instantly round him. Not a word was spoken. Their teeth were set, and their nerves strained to get the youth into the boat. By incredible exertion this was accomplished. He was drawn up till he was on a level with the side of the boat, when he slid over, and rolled helplessly down into the bottom. Bree leaped in last, and with a transport of joy Watty clasped the brave animal round the neck and wept like a child.

The burning ship was now at a great distance, and blazing as fiercely as ever. A loud explosion was heard, a still fiercer light burst from the blazing mass, and in another moment the Petrol went down, and the blackness of darkness fell upon the deep.

The wind had now moderated, and the tremendous sea had sensibly lessened. Day broke at length, and the gray sea, speckled with foam, heaved and panted around them. Their condition was desolate and hopeless enough. In an open boat, in an unknown sea, without provisions, where was there room to cherish great expectations of deliverance.

TO BE CONTINUED.

THE ALABAMA CLAIMS.—The New York Times' special correspondent from Washington, on the 17th says:—Copies of the private correspondence of Minister Thornton and Lord Clarendon have been received here. The rejection of the Alabama treaty by the Senate is alluded to; and Mr. Thornton, in commenting on that point, says the Republican newspapers up to April 20th, approve of Mr. Sumner's propositions very generally. He believed that the claims could be satisfactorily settled by the cession of Canada, which proposition, he states, has been frequently pointed out to him.

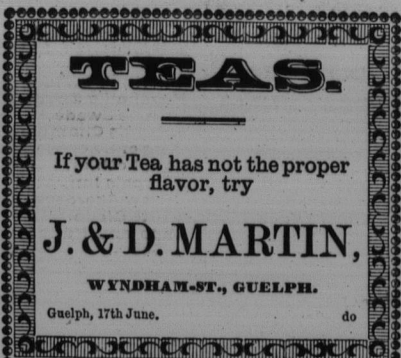

CATARH.—If your head, nose and throat are filled with a burdensome mass of mucus, either dry or moist, thin or thick, white or yellow, and your eyes swollen and heavy, your heads feeling unusually large, with a constant dull heavy pain all through it, resulting from Catarrh, use Dr. J. Briggs' Allevantor. The mucus will be immediately discharged from the head, nose and throat, the eyes brighten, and sparkle with delight: the head feels natural again, all pain has fled, and life once more desirable. Sold by druggists and country merchants generally. Dr. J. Briggs & Co., proprietors, 208 Broadway, N. Y., and No. 6 King Street, West, Toronto. Sold by E. Harvey & Co., Guelph.

NEW WAY OF FATTENING CATTLE.—The Globe says:—We noticed in the cattle market yesterday a very fine and unusually fat calf. It was fed by Mr. Uriah Young, of Pickering, on eggs and milk, with a view to selling it at a fancy price. In this he has succeeded, for it was bought yesterday by Mr. James Britton, butcher, of the Arcade, at the very high price of $30. It will weigh about 60 lbs per quarter.

The Louisville Courier Journal reports the probable tobacco crop of the Western States this year at 130,000 hogheads.

Gen. Lee, while walking near Fredricksburg recently, had flowers strewn in his path by a party of fifty little girls.
