end legations, just as there are men and men, scople and people. At Rome the members of toreign embassies are, as a rule, ceremonious, well bred, and socially elegant in manners.

Buffalo. They are acquainted with the ways of the world and the usages and manners of the best society. A few weeks ago, when the Duke of Edinburgh was in this old city, besides enjoying royal hosmitalities at the quirinal court His Royal Highness went to an elegant luncheon party which was given for him by the first secretary of the British legation, whose wife is the sister of the beautiful Duchess di Sermoneta. After the luncheon the Duke of Edinburgh was entertained elegantly in the handsome villa and grounds of the English ambassador's palace at the Porta Pia, which palace some villa and grounds of the English ambassador's palace at the Porta Pia, which palace and grounds belong to the British Government. The wives of the secretaries of legation were the hostesses on the occasion of this garden tea. The English ambassador, Sir John Savile Lumley, is for the time being absent from Rome, and likewise in deep mourning for his brother, who died this spring at Cannes.

The royal entertainment at the English ambassadorial villa was as socially perfect as such entertainments ought always to be.

But there are legations in Rome, infelicement, totally different, where social refinement and civilized manners are unknown quantities. Indeed, you wonder why they are called legations or how the members can possibly have anything to do with diplomatic life. It seems almost a figure of speech to call them diplomates, so ignorant are they of the quantities. Indeed, you wonder my they are called legations or how the members can possibly have anything to do with diplomatic life. It seems almost a figure of speech to call them diplomates, so ignorant are they of the ordinary usages of even common intercourse among civilized people, and also as to how they should conduct themselves in their official positions so as to command respect.

I remember once the secretary of the Persian legation—his title was printed in full in French on a very dirty visiting card—ame to sall on me as a traveling pedler! He was a most untidy, greasy looking, "dark-complected" man, that Persian secretary. With him came a facchino, or porter, who carried some large packages of common, trashy. Persian sutiffs, which the secretary wished me to buy, or to find purchasers for him. The said secretary of legation, himself, had in his nockets a lot of rubbishy rings—pale turqueises set in base white metal—he called them "talismans" and said they were worn in his country by soldiers in order to secure lucky shots. The secretary retailed these rings at 5 francs apiecs ($1). I bought two or three to get rid of the diplomate. I shall never forget what dirty hands that Persian secretary of legation had!

And as I am on the subject of outlandish legations I will relate to you a remarkable scene that actually occurred in one of these semi-savage diplomatic offices in Rome. I will tell you the tale as it was told to me. This scene could not possibly take place in your courtly official rooms, my stepbrother British—courtly official room seene that actually occurred in one of these semi-savage diplomatic offices in Rome. I will tell you the tale as it was told to me. This seene could not possibly take place in your courtly official rooms, my stepbrother Britisher, and it is to be hoped not in ours, dear American fellow-citizens. For now, at least, the United States is ranked among sivilized nations, and the social status of such officials as Mr. Marsh and Mr. Astor was very satisfactory to Americans.

You have never heard of the legation of His Majesty, the King of the Cannibal Islands. Of course very few persons have, and the fewer that do hear- and know of such a wild place the better it will be for their peace of mind and tranquility of nerves. One fine spring morning a lady—as true a gentlewand as ever trod in shoe kid—was obliged to huntiup that legation. She had some affairs, some busuness interests in the Cannibal Islands and needed to have art official verification of her signature to an important paper, which had to be sent off as quickly as possible by post. For in the Cannibal Islands it appears there are all sort of great money and property transactions, as well as fercoious beasts. When she arrived at the building at which was the legation of the Cannibal Islands readed to the doorkeeper ber deark to find the official rooms he showed her into one, where she found an elderly Cannibal Islands essent off the State of the tailor-shop of the London Poole; his cleanliness was not that of an imperial Roman who luxuriated in baths. He was sucking a cigar and reading a newspaper.

When the lady entered the room this Canmibal Islander was consulted to the Cannibal Islands was in, he add the consultance of the Cannibal Islands was in, he add the consultance of the Cannibal Islands was in, he add the consultance of the Cannibal Islands was in the consultance of the Cannibal Islands was in, he add the consultance of the Cannibal Islands was in, he add the consultance of the Cannibal Islands was in, he add the consultance of the Cannibal Islands

"No; he has gone out of town." "No; he has sone due to the man.
"Is there no vice-consul here?"
"No; he is away," jerked out the man.
The lady was in despair, as we women are apt to be when any hitch in business affairs takes place. We cannot manage with skill and presence of mind an emeute in the cook's department, bring to terms a refractory valet, or pacify a rebellious mind, but business is a dark continent to our minds. So, as I have said, sile grew despairing, and exclaimed:
"Ab, what shall I do? I have with me a most impurtant paper to sign."
Hereupon the Cannibal Islander grew wroth. He did not change the position of the small of his back nor lower his heels, but he cried out roughly, like a great ogre in a fairy tale:
"Us hould think the consularmental had a life of the chandla Pacific Parks."

This unexpected and rude rebuff caused the lady to say, remonstratingly:

"And I should think there ought to be some one here to attend to his business during his absence; for, as in the present case, it is sometimes most important not to lose time."

The Cannibal Islander jumped up, his heals were brought addenly from mantal-niege to sheep. The Cannibal Islander jumped up, his heels were brought suddenly from mantel-piece to floor, the small of the back to a perpendicular

The Cannibal Islander jumped up, his hels were brought suddenly from mantel-piece to Goor, the small of the back to a perpendicular position, and he roared out:

"Look here! Who are you? Coming here to make complaints? Go into the other room if you have any complaints to make. I won't hear them. Go out?"

Now, you or I (I, most certainly) would have heen frightened out of our wits. I am sure I should have been afraid that the ferocious Cannibal Islander meant to eat me up raw without pepper or salt. But the lady in question had the presence of mind to remember that Cannibal Islander would be unwise policy to let a Cannibal Islander know that she was alarmed, so, although she was horribly shocked at this brutal treatment she was receiving, she said, quickly:

"I do not know who you are nor why you dare speak so rudely to a gentlewoman who comes to this office on business."

Then, seeing that the Cannibal Islander was coming toward her in a threat-ning manner, as if he meant to take her by the shoulders and put her out of the room, she prudently and swiftly retreated backward toward the door, all the while facing her assailant bravely and adding in a low voice: "Do not dare to address another word to me. I will not suffer such insolence;" so saying she left the room. When she reached the extrance deer of the building she asked, the door-keeper who was the rude man occupying the office in the obsence of the regular official. To her surprise she was told that it was no less a personage than his excellency the minister plenipotentiary to His Majesty the King of the Cannibal Islands.
