

The British Medical Association will meet this year on 19th, 20th, 21st, 22nd, 23rd, 25th, and 26th of July in Liverpool, under the Presidency of Sir James Barr. An excellent programme of addresses and papers is being arranged. It is expected the meeting will be largely attended.

The hospitals in Australia are in a bad way. The rich have not been so generous of late years, and the result is that the hospitals have much difficulty in financing their way. This has led to a movement for the nationalizing of the hospitals. This, again, the medical profession fears would lead to poor work in the matter of attendance. The contention is put forth that the real remedy is for the wealthy once more to come to the aid of the hospitals.

Dr. Sajous has been appointed to the position of supervising editor of the New York Medical Journal.

Professor Odilon Marc Lannelongue, of Paris, the celebrated surgeon, died 20th December, 1911. He was born on December 4, 1840, at Castora-Verduzan, in the department of the Gers.

Dr. Jelley, who practises in Hackney and its district, is said to have a clientele of 80,000 persons. He has a large district to himself.

OBITUARY

J. M. HAYMAN, M.D., C.M.

Word was received by the McGill authorities recently of the death in Rhodesia of Dr. J. M. Hayman, who took his degree of comparative medicine at that institution. At the time of his death he was in charge of a survey for the Chartered Company of Rhodesia, surveying lands suitable for settlement, cotton-growing and rubber. The deceased had taken a course at the Guelph Agricultural College as well as a course in medicine at McGill, and had won his diploma for agricultural science at Cambridge. He was a son of Canon Hayman, rector of Oldrington, Eng., one-time headmaster of Rugby.

ROBERT ASTLEY CORBETT, M.D.

Dr. Robert Astley Corbett, of Port Hope, died at Ocean Park, Cal., where he was sojourning. He had a large practice and was president