some academical distinctions. His industry was great of the Gospel to their understandings, and levied, and constant. He devoted the day to study, and a large portion of the night to the composition of a commentary upon what he had seen or read. From Geneva he was sent to Lentzbourg, a town in the Swiss Cantons, where he learned the German language, self-denying as Fletcher's, gradually undermined his and extended his intercourse with books; and when health, and symptoms of consumption alarmed his he returned to Nyon, he applied himself to the ac- friends. He was familiar with testants of the Cevennes mountains, and in his brief the Scriptures, and endeavoured to govern his con- sojourn among those simple cottagers. He gained duct by their precepts. He even ventured to rebuke strength and vigour from this tour; but towards the others, and his reproof to a visitor, at the house of his close of 1775, we find him telling Wesley, that old sister, has been preserved. Heaven does, indeed, age crept on him in quick strides. After another unsuccessful effort to enter the army of Holland, he visited England; and, having made himself acquainted with our language and literature, he was appointed, in 1752, tutor to the sons of Mr. Hill, a gentleman of fortune and influence, who resided in Shropshire. The military ardour of Fletcher seems to have died away, as wider and juster views of the priestly office were unfolded to his meditation. The origin of his strict observance of the Sabbath is traced by his biographers to the accidental reproof of a servant, in the family of Mr. Hill, who found him copying music upon that day. His mind, always serious and reflective, now turned with hope towards the Church, and on the 6th of March, 1757, he was ordained deacon, by the Bishop of Bangor. His heart had already begun to glow with that love of Christ and of His Gospel, which renders every worldly object unlovely in the Christian's eyes, except as it is regarded in relation to its author.

Fletcher, when a valuable living was offered to him by Mr. Hill, preferred the poorer parish of Madeley, -a very extensive and populous village, abounding in all those incentives to vice and disorder, which collieries and iron-works always call into existence.-When he settled in Madeley, in 1760, the village contained eighteen public-houses, and the inhabitants were steeped in poverty, and degraded by ignorance. Nor was their spirit of irreligion a passive spirit; it broke out in violent animosities, and personal insults. Fletcher relates some anecdotes of the inconveniences and the dangers he underwent, in the zealous discharge of his duty. The Christian leaven was small fluence. The education of the younger members of his flock dred children were taught under his superintendence. His manners were singularly calculated to win the affection, and to awaken the curiosity of his infant audiences. Upon one occasion he was surrounded by several children, and while giving them some wise admonitions respecting their conduct, he observed that Gilpin has drawn a touching picture of the sorrow that pervaded Madeley, while the Village Pastor lay upon his bed of suffering and death. After the eveg service, many persons, who had come from remote hamlets, lingered about the parsonage, in the faint hope of obtaining one glimpse of their benefactor and friend, before he was taken from them. Their anxious wish was gratified. "The door of the chamber being set open, immediately before which Fletcher was sitting upright in his bed, with the curtains undrawn, -unaltered in his usual venerable appearance, -they slowly moved, one by one, along the gallery, severally pausing as they passed by the door, and casting in a mingled look of supplication and anguish." Such a scene might have inspired the pencil of Raphael, and, even in the simple narrative of Gilpin, it UPHOLSTERER AND PAPER HANGER. calls the tears into our eyes. Upon this same night, about half past ten o'clock, being the 14th of August, 1785, the Village Pastor closed his eyes in sure and certain hope.
