"To a large extent," it said, "Ottawa is symbolical of the Dominion as he two great races whose united labors and genius have placed it in the day. They have labored in the past in a spirit of mutual sympathy and tolerafoundations of a greater Britain, and while thus advancing the material prosperity of the Dominion, the same spirit has been displayed in furthering its moral and intellectual progress." Prince Reads Reply.

The prince read his reply in a clear, esonant voice. He received the address, he said, with much satisfaction, and was greatly pleased to listen in the capital of Canada to the assurances of alty and devotion, weich he would convey to his Majesty the King. He was especially touched with the reference to the late beloved Queen Victoria. He could not doubt that the deep-seated loyalty which he had seen in Canada was to be ascribed, in large measure, to the wisdom of her rule. He had heard with interest about previous visits of members of the royal family to Ottawa, and was glad to associate himself among the number.

He congratulated the city on its com-mercial and municipal progress, and concluded by saying that he had enjoyed his visit to Western Canada, and looked forward with equal pleasure to his sojourn in Eastern Canada.
