The work was done in a very exhaustive way, and while we cannot and do not claim exemption from losses, the results of the examination have, on the whole, been very satisfactory. Of the properties that have come into the company's hands during the depression, nearly $100,000 worth have been disposed of during the year, without great loss, and we have every reason to hope that we shall be equally or even more successful in making sales in the current year. Coming now to an examination of the profit and loss sheet, I may at once state that, notwithstanding the largely increased business of the company, and although our compensation for the management of estates has, owing to the increased volume of work, been greater than in any year, still our net profits have been considerably reduced. The explanation of this is one that will readily be understood by every share holder, and more particularly by those who are directors of loan companies.
