A GHOST STORY.

There was a large party of us commercial travellers in the smoking-room of the "George." One of us had started the subject of ghosts, and we were very merry over stories of folk, fou and sober, who imagined they had seen a ghost and afterwards found their mistake. Jim Peters, however, who was the oldest man in the room, sat smoking in silence. He usually led the conversation of any company he happened to be in, and had besides a large stock of aneedotes, so that his silence was remarkable.

"Thinking over a good thing, Peters?" said some one. "You are very quiet to-night."

"I don't like your joking about the subject," said he, seriously. "I once saw a real ghost."

Every eye was instantly turned on him at this analysis of the death of my poor old friend."

"What I might avenge the death of my poor old friend."

"What did Harris mean by the 'man of my dreams, "said one of us, "and what become of him?"

"He was hanged at Edinburgh," replied Peters. "My saluting him by the name of his victim and staring at him so earnestly made such an impression on his mind that he constantly dreamed of my poor old friend."

That a limit a limit a limit and staring at him so earnestly made such an impression on his mind that he constantly dreamed of him?"

"He was hanged at Edinburgh," replied Peters. "My saluting him by the name of his victim and staring at him so earnestly made such an impression on his mind that he constantly dreamed from politics, as indeed I did. That's my story. You see I have good reason for not thinking ghosts a fit subject for laughter."

"Every eye was instantly turned on him at the constant of the subject," said he, seriously. "I once saw a real ghost."

Every eye was instantly turned on him at the constant of the man of him the time."

Every eye was instantly turned on him at this announcement.

Peters took a sip of toddy and procoeded to refill his pipe, remarking at the same time, "It happened a long time ago; before a lot of you fellows were born." Our curiosity being excited, we press-cour outloomly being excited, we pressed him to relate his experience.

"It was about forty years ago," he said, "I was quite a young fellow, but I held some very good commissions in the wine trade. A traveller's life was very different then; there were no railways; I did most of my journeys in a light gig. I had been up through the highlands as far as Inverness, and was driving over to Eigin, when I saw the ghost. It was a wild night. A storm of wind and hail sprang up, and I made but slow progress. Darkness set in while I was still some miles from the town. The wind was cold and pieroing, and the hail fell like drops of molten lead upon my face. I don't know that I ever was more miserable. However, I comforted myself as well as I could, and longed converter for the results of the relation of the relation of the relation.

there is no danger of farther conflict over the royal marriage question.

I ever was more miserable. However, I comforted myself as well as I could, and longed earnestly for John Laing's fireside. He had been a customer of my father's who was on the road before me. I was always sure of a good order and warm welcome from old John Well, I say, I was heartily wishing myself at his fireside over a tumbler of toddy, when the wind lulled a little and the moon came out, and to my surprise I saw coming towards me no other than John Laing himself, accompanied by a tall, dark-leoking man.

""Why, oried I, are you so far from town on such a night, Mr. Laing?" He did not answer, but walked on, and as he passed I leaned over the gig side to repeat my question. Great Heaven! his throat seemed out from ear to ear, and in his hand the tall man carried a razor dripping with blood! I sat spell-bound watching them, till the moon once more becoming obscured, I lost sight of them in the darkness. The cold sweat was standing like beads on my forchead, and I shook in every limb. My horse had been strangely restless since the two appeared, and now that they were behind him, he set off for Eigin, despite the wind and rain, as if the devil were after him.

"I drove straight to John Laing's house—"

"And found your friend all safe and sound," broke in one of us, with a laugh.

Peters bent forward, and said solemnly, "I found that he had been got in bed that morning with his throat cut from ear to ear.

A cry of horror broke from us, but Peters, waving his hand to command silence, continued, "The motive of the crime was clearly robbery. John Laing did not believe in banks. He had a small safe in his bedroom, in which he kept his savings. It was open and mpty."
"Was the criminal never found?"

"A stranger—a tall, dark man—had been hanging about one of the hotels for some days. He disappeared at the time of the murder without paying his bill, but all efforts to find him failed. bill, but all efforts to find him failed. I waited for poor Laing's funeral, and then made my way southward. When I went to square up I found that the firm from whom I held my best commissions had taken in a partner, and as he was to travel, I was no longer required. The others I held were not much to depend on, so I looked about, and at last rot a start from a large and at last got a start from a large grain and flour merchant. I had to cover the south of Scotland, and so far into England as Newcastle. On my first journey to the latter place I put up at the "Piercy Arms," a nice new up at the "Piercy Arms," a nice new hotel. I got on very well, and booked some large orders. One evening, as I was returning rather later than usual, I encountered a tall, dark-haired man in the hotel lobby. He seemed aghast at my appearance, and gesticulated wildly saying, 'The man in the dream!' He was in such a state of terror that I looked closely and curiously at him. I felt a cold shiver come over me as I recognised him. He was the ghostly man I had seen with the blood stained razor that fearful night. He was the ghostly man I had seen with the blood stained razor that fearful night. He recovered his composure long before I did, and said, with an attempt at a smile, I have to apologise for my rudeness. I am the landlord, Mr. Harris. I was practicing for private theatricals—I hope you did not think me mad.' I tried to look as if his explanation were hope you did not think me mad.' I tried to look as if his explanation were quite satisfactory, and declining his invitation to step into the bar-parlour, passed on to my room. I did not sleep any that night. I lay tossing in bed, trying to unravel my thoughts about the matter, but it was no use. The house seemed strangely quiet, and an eerie feeling which had hung about me since my encounter in the lobby became more and more intensified. The shutting of a door somewhere down. came more and more intensified. The shutting of a door somewhere downstairs seemed to break the spell. I bounded out of bed and pulled up my blind. It was a beautiful moonlight night, almost clear enough to read by, and to my surprise I saw the landlord, Mr. Harris, sneaking down the street, with a small black beg in his hand. My mind was instantly made up to fol low him. I watched which turn he took, and, hastily dressing, followed as fast as I could. As I suspected he went straight to the docks. The tide was almost full, and the London boat would sail in an hour. I saw him go would sail in an hour. I saw him go aboard, and then looked about for a policeman. I had resolved to venture on a bold stroke. Fortunately I easily secured a constable, and telling him I

"It's a he!" he shouted in an agony of fear as the officers seized him.

"Now that he was captured, the full responsibility of my situation flashed on me. I had absolutely no evidence against the man—nothing but my own sure conviction, the reason of which I felt sure would only be laughed at by any one else. As we walked to the Police Office the prisoner continued to glance sideways at me, and to mutter to himself. By a great effort I managed to bear, "The man of my dream — the man of my dream."
