THE PERFECT PATROL.

The tenderfoot, when he joins a patrol, usually casts envious eyes at the patrol leader, whose position appears to him to be a most desirable one.

He does not stop to consider that the patrol leader is not a man who is to be envied, but a man who is to be respected.

Should the present reader be in the position of the envious tenderfoot, he will find it well worth his while to reflect upon the patrol leader's post is always one to be desired.

Of course, it is every keen scout's ambition to rise from tenderfoot to second-class scout, and thus from first-class to king's scout, and eventually to Silver Wolf.

When Shakespeare wrote "Uneasy lies the head that wears a crown," he was not sacrificing truth for the sake of effect.

In its own way, the position of a patrol leader is like that of a king; he is solely responsible for the half dozen or more boys in his charge, and it is he who bears the brunt of any blame that may be going.

It appears a rather jolly thing to be able to order other boys about, and to make them do just as you tell them, but to appreciate the position, every order is essential and unavoidable, and given only when wanted.

If you get a fussy leader, giving twenty orders where you would be amply, you may safely take it that he does not appreciate his position. If he did, he would realize that there is a chance of making a slip with every command given, and he would be sparing with his orders.

This is a distinctly difficult part to play—one moment in the ranks, the next, very likely without warning, in charge of his comrades.

A good second in command is absolutely necessary to a well-trained patrol, and just as a mate must hold a master's certificate, so a corporal should be a capable patrol leader—and know his place.

I prefaced these remarks with a word to the rank and file, and there is one point on which a scout must be perfectly clear before he can become a really useful factor in his patrol.

He is bound by his promise to obey the scout law, and, consequently, to respond at once to his officers' orders without question. So far, so good; but it is very little use obeying orders while it goes against the grain all the time.

It is quite easy, while you are studying for the tenderfoot test, and before being sworn in, to satisfy yourself whether you do really feel that way about your leaders, if you cannot persuade yourself that you do, join another troop.

Co-operation and sympathy throughout the patrol must exist, but it will never do so if the members are always jibbing at distasteful orders.

Lastly, as to your scoutmaster. Remember
