Harvey Home.
I looked o'er the waving fields
On golden, bearded grain,
That danced on gentle uplands,
Bipped o'er many a plain,
And my heart was glad and thankful,
Earth's promise seemed so fair;
'Oh, give our voices fruition'
Hope found a voice in prayer.

or a Claude. And the merry group of girls, and the sedate and sad women, were, with the children, the dogs, and the other little attendants of the scene, singularly conspicuous in the deep shadow of the trees, around thirty yards from the fire, which the women were congregated. It was evident, from the steady bearing of the camp, that the Indians considered themselves tolerably secure in Wyandot, and that they trusted chiefly to the help of the Crow's Nest, the property of the Indian Hunter.

He listened once more, for now the least error would endanger the success of his enterprise. Not a sound came from the camp. He looked back to see what shadow there was of a light, and prepared to fall. The impulse was momentary, he quietly resumed a crouching position on the bough, perfectly convinced that there is no danger to him, the forest, and waited.

When Castalga left his companions in that wild gully of the woods he began his journey with all that caution and circumspection for which his race has long been widely celebrated. His ear drank in every sound, he trod the woods with the lightness of a fawn, his feet scarcely stirred the leaves and twigs which covered the ground, and his arms were so held as to avoid all chance of contact with the trees.

He listened to the talk of the girls, he heard the guttural tones of the warriors, the bark of the dogs over their bones, and then suddenly he started, despite his self-possession, as a howl resounded through the forest—a wail, a howl of woe, uttered by one long practiced in such accents. A death-like pause ensued, the warriors were all silent, he laughed in his soul, as all waited for the explanation of this noise.
