Engineer's Testimony.

BATTLE CREEK, Mich., Nov. 10.—Engineer Randall, of the yard switch engine, testified at the inquest on the victims of the Chicago and Grand Trunk wreck this morning that his engine was at the depot when No. 6 came in and that it did not pass the train afterward. This contradicts Engineer Wooley's statement that the switch engine passed while he was oiling his engine and he thought it was No. 9. George Johnson, conductor of the switch engine, said that no engine or train passed No. 6 while it was at the depot. This is another flat denial of the statement of Wooley and his fireman.

Frederick Wortz, of Rochester, N. Y., testified that the fire started under the stove. Chester Thompson, of Woodstock, Ont., said that he did not notice any material change in the speed of the train before the collision.

Supt. Atwater, of Detroit, said the engineer and conductor were equally responsible for the running of the trains. The road had tried steam heat, but Jound it more dangerous than the Baker heators, for in case of an accident the escaping steam might scald the passengers. Electricity was also tried for lighting purposes, but it was not a success.

Reminiscence of Stormy Forty-

London and Lord Elgin.

Addresses From One Body.

He Was Not Awed by Hostile Demonstrations.

Recollections of an Eye-Witness of the

The Governor-General's recent visit to this city recalled to the minds of the early settlers who witnessed the welcome a imilar occasion over 40 years ago when Lord E|gin was making a tour of the country. The attendant circumstances, however, were radically different. Lord Aberdeen's welcome was spontaneous and universal; that of Lord Elgin was, on the one hand, heartily enthusiastic, on the other, bitterly antagonistic. London, at that time, was a hamlet, clinging to the water-washed banks of the Thames: now he is a commercial center of recognized importance. Then no railway had penetrated the forest-grown peninsula of Western Ontario; now hundreds of trains daily rush through cities, towns and cultivated farm-lands which have sprung, mirage-like, from primeval surroundings. Then everything in this section of the Province was almost new and crude: now

Then everything in this section of the Province was almost new and crude; now the hand of a progressive civilization is universally apparent.

Lord Elgin, like his successor, was a man of distinguished parts—erudite in knowledge, a brilliant speaker, and extremely independent in his views upon public questions. It was probably the latter propensity, combined with the fact that he was a staunch Liberal, that, more than anything else, occasioned the storm of disapproval which tollowed his signing the Rebellion Losses Bill. His action was approved by Liberals generally; but the acrimony which was engendered among the admantine Tories is impossible of description. An organized mob of these ultraloyalists rotten-egged the Governor-General and burned the Parliament buildings at Montreal; and wherever the Governor-General went the sympathizers of the incendiaries offered him every indignity in their power. At London an effort similar to those which in other places had been partially successful was made to render Lord Elgin's coming to the city impossible. It signally failed. The object of the Governor's visit primarily was to ascertain the feeling obtaining throughout the country as a consequence of his act in supporting the existing Government, which, as a consequence of his act in supporting the existing Government, which, as a consequence of his act in supporting the existing Government, which, as a consequence of his act in supporting the existing Government, which, as a consequence of his act in supporting the existing Government, which, as a consequence of his act in supporting the existing Government, which, as a consequence of his act in support duty to do.

"An is usual in such cases," says a Londoner who was a young man at the time, and a close student of public affairs, "the town council commenced to make preparations to give the Queen's representative a fitting reception. The extreme Tory element objected to his coming at all; but the Liberals were bound to make a demonstration. The minority of the members, headed by Mr. T. C. Dixon, who was mayor at the time, refused to countenance the address of welcome which the majority had prepared; and, in order to give a tangible expression to their dissent, they formulated a document inveighing against the Governor. Henry R. Becher, John B. Smyth, William Horton, Alfred Smith and Lawrence Lawrason, all well-known residents of this district then, were also ranged in opposition. Mr. Marcus Holmes—who, by the way, was the father of Mrs. William Ralph Meredith—was appointed to read the address of the majority. Both sections made extensive preparations. Severalarches were creeted to honor the visitor by hissympathizers, while the violent Torice secretly repared for molestation and strife.

"As is usual in such cases," says a Lon-

"The events which are under narration occurred in the fall of 1849. As there were no railways, Lord Elgin was accompanied upon his journey by cavalcades of sympathizers. A Brantford contingent brought him as far as Dorchester. Here he was met by the Londoners, who had left the town—which was almost deserted with he town—which was almost deserted with he exception of those forming the discontented party—about 10 o'clock in the morning. Niles' House was the rendezvous morning. Niles' House was the rendezvous at which a luncheon was served. Among those present who are still in the land of materialism are: Samuel McBride, E. Jones Parke, Alexander McIntosh, Wm. Gordon, Robert Reid, Hewitt Fysh and James Williams. Mr. (afterwards Senator Gordon, Robert Reid, Hewitt rysh and James Williams. Mr. (afterwards Senator) Leonard was also an active member of the deiggation that went out to welcome the Governor-General to the West. Several hundred of the yeomen of Westminster had assembled on horseback to greet the Governor, and these were marshaled in line on either side of the road in the vicinity of the hotel.

"While Lord Elgin was being feted in the hostlery, three magistrates from London—Police Magistrate Lawrason, Squire Mackenzie, of St. Thomas, and Squire Matthews—came riding up in hot haste. They asked to see the Governor, and were admitted into his presence. The first mentioned official was spokesman. As a conveyance, accompanied by Sheriff Colin Munro, William McKay, Dr. Southwick and Robert Reid, and the triumphal procession was organized. About four miles from Niles' House the cavaloade overtook the three magistrates, whose wagon had broken down. A number of those in the troop were inclined to let the law administrators shift for themselves. Finally, though, someone took compassion upon them and rendered the required assistance. Arriving in the village, the work which the aniagonistic element had accomplished was plainly visible. The large, handsome arches, which had but shortly before been completed, were razed to the ground. All the other decorations and signs of welcome had been removed. But the perpertance of the guest's escort, which now included a dotachment of milita under Col. Cunningham, suddenly became pacified, and no attempt at open violence was made. At the old Robinson House, a frame building, long since removed, Lord Elgin alighted. Here he prepared to receive the municipal addresses.

"The scene before the hotel just at this juncture has probably never been repeated in the history of London. In the streets of the vicinity, and extending over the jail yard, were massed what has been variously estimated at from 8,000 to 10,000 people. Everybody in the village, and almost the whole of the inhabitants of the surrounding district, were present. Extremely discordant were the component elements of the crowd. The Liberals crowded for positions of vantage, and the Tories kept up a continual din. To the address of the majority, which was complimentary and encouraging in its terms, Lord Elgin made a fitting reply. This was received by varying shouts of approval and cries of dissent. Mr. T. C. Dixon then read the minority's address, containing a wail about encouraging in its terms, Lord Elgin made a fitting reply. This was received by varying shouts of approval and ories of dissent. Mr. T. C. Dixon then read the minority's address, containing a wail about the disaffection and evils which had resulted from the Governor signing the alleged obnoxious measure. Lord Elgin commenced his reply by expressing the tegret which he entertained at hearing from his friend that any dissatisfaction had arisen from any act of his. The constitutional rights of the people, he affirmed, had in any event to be maintained. As representative of the Queen, he was there to aid any project with this object in view. He was willing to shoulder all the responsibility of any feeling which had been the outcome of his action. He was sorry that any disposition to create discord had been evinced, but as far as he had seen the majority of the right-thinking people were entirely satisfied with this course. If my friends, he concluded, 'are exited in consequence of the right-thinking people were entirely satisfied with this course. 'If my friends,' he concluded, 'are excited in consequence of anything which I have done, I have but to say that men in a state of excitement are not in a position to judge fairly of any manly act.' Lord Elgin's outspoken, vigorous phrases disarmed opposition. The captions of his hearers were completely cowed. They had not the heart to offer further affronts.

'In connection with a recital of these events, it is but fair to add a word regarding the part which the late Judge Wilson—at that time plain Mr. John Wilson—had in them. He was the Conservative member; and was so shocked at his fellow-politicians and political friends he arose in the House and disclaimed any connection with a party which would condone or justify such an act. In order to make a test election on the affair he resigned his seat. The contest which enaued in the riverside village was acrimonious and vigorous. Mayor Dixon ran in the Tory interests against Mr. Wilson—who had been taken up by the Liberals—and was badly beaten. Yes, we had fully as lively times in those days as we have now, and I am proud to say that the people were not altogether unresponsive to appeals in favor of the right."
