The Herbert home, a showy country lace in a region of farms, merited a ame; but no one except Mrs. Herbert, who in the first flush of possession deter-nined so to dignify it, had ever made use of the name she had chosen after much deliberation. General Herbert himself demoration. General Herbert nimself called it simply the farm, while to the neighbors and the dwellers in Mount Hope it was known as the general's place, which perhaps sufficiently distinguished it, for its owner was still always spoken of as the general, though since the war he had been gowernor of his state.

Rather less than half a century before aniel Herbert, then a country urchin nding cattle on the hillside where now ood his turreted stone mansion, had de-ded that some day when he should be ch he would return and buy that hillrich he would return and buy that hillside and the great reach of flat river bottom that lay adjacent to it, and there time of this decision consisted of a pair of jean trousers, a hickory shirt and a battered straw hat. For years he had forgotten his boyish ambition. He had made his way in the world; he had won success in his profession, the law; he had won even greater distinction as a soldier in the Civil War; he had been a national figure in politics, and he had been governor of his state. And then had come the country-bred man's hunger for the soil.

He had remembered that hillside where as a boy he had tended his father's herds. He was not a rich man, but he had married a rich woman, and it was her money that bought the many acres and built the many-turreted mansion. Wishing, perhaps, to mark the impermanency of the life there and to give it a purely holiday aspect, Mrs. Herbert had christened the place Idle Hour; but the governor, beyond occasional participation in local politics, never again resumed those activities by which he had so distinguished himself. He wore top-boots and rode about the farm on an old gray horse, while his intimates were the neighboring while his intimates were the neighboring farmers, with whom he talked crops and politics by the hour. In pained surprise Mrs. Herbert, a woman of great ambition, had endured five years of this kind of life; with unspeakable bitterness of spirit she had seen the once potent name of Daniel Herbert disappear from the newspapers, and then she had died. On her death the general became on her death the general became a rich, and, in a way, a free man, for now he could, without the silent protest of his wife, recover the neglected lore of wood and field, and practice forgotten arts that had in his boyhood come under the elastic head of chores. In this agreeable comradeship with his daughter, General Herbert had lived through the period of his bereavement with very tolerable comfort. He had rendered the dead the dead's due of regretful tenderness; but Elizabeth never asked him when he was going to make his recentry into relities; and she never rere-entry into politics; and she never reproached him with having wasted the very best years of his life in trying to make four hundred acres of scientifical farmed land show a profit, a feat he had not accomplished. The former received North with a perceptible shade of reserve. He knew more about the young man than he would have cared to tell his daughter, since he believed it would be better for her to make her own discoveries where North was concerned. He had not opposed his frequent visits to Idle Hour, for he felt that if Elizabeth, was interested in the young fellow opposition would only strengthen it. Glancing at North as he greeted Elizabeth, the general admitted that whatever he might be, he was presentable, indeed good-looking, handsome. Why hadn't he done something other than make a mess of his life? He wondered, too, wishing to be quite fair, if North had not been the subject of a good deal of unmerited censure; if, after all, his idleness had not been the worst thing about him. He hoped this might be true. Still, he regretted that Elizabeth should have allowed their boy and girl friendship—they had known each other always—to grow into a closer intimacy.

In the minds of these two men there was absolute accord on one point. was absolute accord on one point. Either would have said that Elizabeth Herbert's beauty was a supreme endow-Herbert's beauty was a supreme endowment, and more nearly perfect than the beauty of any other woman. She was slender, not tall, but poised and graceful with a distinction of bearing that added to her inches. Her hair was burnished copper, and her coloring the tint of warm ivory with the sunlight showing through. North gazed at her as though he would store in his memory the vision of her lavaliness.
