

blance to the sound, but associated with it in consciousness at the time. The arrows point in the line of suggestion.

All science is not reducible, as some have supposed, to mere exactness of nomenclature; nor, when terms have become fixed in general usage, is it desirable to introduce the confusion which almost inevitably results from a change. But the present case is one in which usage is still vacillating, and for that reason it appears to me that an improvement would be reached in psychological nomenclature, if for Law of Similarity were substituted Law of Immediate and Intrinsic Association, for Law of Contiguity, Law of Mediate and Extrinsic Association.
