To the Electors of Lower Canada,

And thofe of the County and Towns of Quebec in particular.

SINCE the cautionary addrefs which we made you in the Gazette of the 17 th. inflant thera have been diffributed among the people a variety of Hand-bills, fome recomendatory of Candidates and tome juftificatory of themfelves; and among the number is one defamaztory; all of them are innocent and decent except the laft mentiored, whichabounds with illiberality and fallchood ; we fhall therefore diffect it and endeavour to confute the arguments and deftroy the infinuations contained in it.
The author of the "avis aux canadiens" ftates, ift. That it appears to be agreed upon between the Britifh Merchants that they ought to be the only Keprefentatives in the Houfe of Af: rembly.
$2^{d}$. That by their canvaffing jointly---they have concerted a Coalition, which difcovers their geat illiberality (which he ironically calls literality) for the Canadians.
$3^{1}$. That if the Englifh Merchants are elected, the fundamental Laws of the Canadians will derive no advantage or be perhaps altered and injured.
$4^{\text {th }}$. That he fmalleft "Reverje" may take them out of the Province, and therefore they ought to have no pretenfions to concern themfelves about it.
$5^{\text {th }}$. That there fhould be fuch a union of interelts between the Electors and Reprefentatives, that whatever Laws may be made by the Legiflature thall equally aflect all the members of the Houfe of Affembly as well as the body of the people, by which he would infinuate that there is no connexion or communication of interefts between the Britith Merchants and the Body of ihe people.
The firf and fecond affertions are proved to be palpable falfehoods, by the divifion that every man fees exifts in the Lower Town ; where the Englith Intereft is divided by four or five Candidates flanding on their own ftrength unconnegted with each other and fupported by different friends. It is likewife too notorious that the Merchants never affeeted to think that they had an exclufive right to be returned Reprefentatives; they pofiefs too much good fenfe and equity to look for a monoply, it is their common converfation that the Election flould be Iree and open to every man, that the people fhould choofe without Bias fuch characters (whether Merchants or Seigneurs or No-fcignieurs) as they think will make the beft Laws for the Agriculture, as well as for the Commerce of the Country. And, it is we believe the firft time thar ihe Mercantile body have ever been fufpected ot want of Liberalily towards the Canadians, either in the line of trade or in perfonal refpect;
They have been exceedingly libera! in their dealings with the Canadians, and inftead of treating them with hauteur, fcorn, and infult, they have confidered them as men, friends, neighboura and Fellow citizens, equal in the Eye of the Law with themfelves.
In anfwer to the third infinuation, we do infift no proof appears that the Britinh Merchants have ever attempted to get the fundamental Laws of the Country altered. They wihed for good and falutary Laws for all ranks of people, that cvery man might be fecure in the free Enjoyment of his Libertv and property; and where they fett a grievance, they complained and applied for Redrefs; when they afked for laws to fecure circulating commercial property, they did at the fame time in a very pointed manner recommend that the rights and interefts of the Scigneur, the Miller, the Curé, and the Habitants ghould be fecured.
The Author of "avis alux canadiens" by the fourth infinuation betrays either great Dif? loyalty or grofs ignorance; for if by the word "Rcerrje" he means the the change of Sovereigns, he may be pronounced a Traitor to the King and Pcople of Great Britain from whom he enjoys a very honorable and lucrative place, and weare bold to fay that he is the only Traitor in the Country; if by "Reverfe" he means only the vicifitudes of fortune among individual Merchants, and that if they do not fucceed in their commerci. 1 enterprife, they mult return from whence they came, we may laugh at his flupidity, and while we defpife the impotence of his malice, we will inform him that, under the Britifh Government, the generation of Merchants is hike the generation of men; and that if by any wife Refolution of the Author of the handibill and his Coadjutors all the Britifh Merchants were expelled the Country, double the number would refort to the Province from Great Britain; fo truly may the ancient Proverb "Non deficit alter" be applied upon this fubject. We fee (almoft daily) that "Reveryes" in the courfe of Nature take away the Merchants as they do Scizneurs, and yet we find no vacyum in the Mercantile fyftem; others rife and fpring up to fill the place of thofe that death has called away; and though the fythe of time mows them down without diftinction (Merchants seigneurs and others,) it deftroys not Commerce, for that will live as long as time itfelf; nothing can deffroy Commerce but oppreffive and arbitrary principles, fuchas the author of the handbill poffefles, and it is to be hoped that among the few Corners of the carth where it may find refuge it may becountenanced in Canada hereafter. The Britifh Merchants have a million and a half of money circulating in the two provinces of Canada; There are fome hundreds of thoufands of Bufleds of wheat annually exported from Lower Canada by the Britifh Merchants, befides many other exports to a great amount; furely thefe are great and importantenterprifes and rifques; they have caufed the value of lands and Houfes from one end of the province to the other to be doubled at leaff, and under our prefent Covernment there is every reafon to expect they will ftill increafe. The Britifh Merchant may be confidered the beft friend to the Farmer and to the Cultivator of the land, whofe induftry he rewards, and towards whom he always caries himfelf with refpect and civility. It may therefore be prefumed that he has a very ftrong title and great preterfion to concern himfelf in the welfare and Legillation of the Country.
