UNIQUE STRUCTURAL BUILDING FEATURES

How Every Available Inch of Ground is Being Utilized For New Yonge Street Edifice.

Unique structural features are expressed in the new building which the Mason & Risch Piano Company are erecting on Yonge-street, opposite Shuter-street. It is to be a six-story structure at first, but is built heavy enough to bear an additional four storeys at some future date. Reinforced concrete is the type of construction as opposed to structural steel pillars and beams, and for this reason the building stands alone, so far, in the era of high buildings for Toronto. The concrete pillars and beams exemplify the "skeleton" framework principle, the same as the columns and girders, and the brick curtain walls are to be hung on these beams the same as with the skeleton steel type of structure.

In erecting the party lines it was found that the soil was not good enough to carry the tremendous load on the various columns, so concrete caissons were sunk 44 feet below the sidewalk to bed rock.

In erecting the party lines it was found that the soil was not good enough to carry the tremendous load on the various columns, so concrete caissons were sunk 44 feet below the sidewalk to bed rock.

The method of erecting a monolithic concrete structure appears slow to the ordinary observer, but it is a slow process of erection, because the building doesn't rise as quickly as steel frame work, but from the time the order is given to proceed with the work, the architects, Bond & Smith of Wellington-street, claim it is a much speedier system. In fact, Mr. Bond declared to The World yesterday that, although the building was started five months after the order was given for the Union Bank building on the corner of King and Bay-streets, it will likely have the roof on first. Much time is consumed in the preliminary getting out of steel beams, etc. Just now, too, it is hard to get orders for structural steel filled quickly on account of a heavy demand. Several thousand dollars have been saved by employing the reinforced concrete system. To take a peep in at the work now in progress is like a glimpse into a forest of scintillations, so thick are the bracings required in holding up the forms for heavy puddings that will harden into rigid beams. The uprights, or columns, are huge affairs owing to the idea that they may be called upon to bear the floor of a 25th story building on either side. First a box is built the size of the pillar to be, and into it is stuck a bunch of iron rods to the height of the next floor above. Then the cement aggregate is poured in. At the junction of each floor these are coupled by a pipe sleeve.

W the beams, practically the same method is employed, except truss steel rods are used horizontally to take up the tension. The concrete takes the compression and the steel the tension in all cases. The columns in this building are designed to carry a heavier load than any columns yet employed in Toronto.

On account of it being a piano building the floors had to be made resonant. Concrete floors would be too dead, so a system of hollow tiles between concrete joists was adopted. In this respect the whole building is fireproof. It is expected to have the roof on about the middle of September, and to get the work done in time, a gang of forty men are working from 12 o'clock Sunday night to 12 o'clock Saturday night.

In exterior design and interior finish the structure will present a very elaborate appearance. It is the aim of the company to make it the finest piano warehouse in the Dominion. The Mason & Risch people will occupy the entire building as salesrooms and warehouses with business office on the top floor.

The structural principles adopted in this building will not be discarded much in the future. It is light, fireproof and doesn't affect the insurance risk. The architects are employing it on an overhead bridge in the building two of the Mason & Risch factories, and the mechanical building of The News which will be erected at the rear of the old emergency hospital on Bay-street, is to be the same. Also, they are using it on the new three-story plant and buildings of the Georgetown Coast-Paper Company. The main structure will be 260 feet long and will cost approximately $400,000.
