A federal garrison comprising officials and soldiers were at the Empalme railway station when the attack was made, and they immediately made off to Fort Tovar Gonzales. The soldiers met the inhabitants of Colonia fleeing before the Indians toward Empalme and between their pursuers and rescuers, the latter were unable to direct at the attack on the battlefield when the Indians withdrew to the hills.

PREDICTS A GREAT GRAIN BLOCKADE; HOLDS RAILROADS BLAMELESS

Head of Grand Trunk Says There Must Be Better Steamship Service or More Elevators

(Canadian Press) Toronto, Sept. 8.—J. Chamberlain, president of the Grand Trunk Railway, back after a tour of the west with a party of Grand Trunk officials, predicts a more serious grain blockade this year than has ever occurred before, but says that it is the facilities for moving the grain to the terminals and not the railways that are at fault. "I don't hesitate to say," Mr. Chamberlain declared, "that the three railways are in a position as far as rolling stock is concerned to move all the grain they will be asked to handle, but it cannot be removed from the terminal points. There is now a plentiful and considerable quantity of the year's grain awaiting removal and our company has a great many loaded cars standing idle. The labor shortage is the real trouble, but it is towards the probable blockade by delaying steamship sailings that in any case there are not enough grain elevators to get the grain away with proper haste. "As far as elevator accommodation is concerned, as far as the Grand Trunk is concerned, but only for transferring grain from the cars to the elevators, getting grain to the elevators is the trouble. Though that better facilities for getting grain out of the country or additional storage facilities are absolutely necessary, they are not intended for storage purposes, but they are obliged to be used for that purpose."

DECISION OF MAGISTRATE IN WHITE CASE

Text of Hon. R. J. Ritchie's Finding in the North End Arrest

THE USE OF HAND-CUFFS

Matter of Violence and the Right to Search Prisoners Also Referred to and Decisions in English and Canadian Courts Quoted

Because of the interest in the case of Wm. White, recently arrested in North End, the Times here publishes the full text of the judgment given in the police court on Saturday by Hon. R. J. Ritchie.

The defendant stands charged with drunkenness and with resisting the police, whilst they were in the discharge of their lawful duty. The defendant was arrested for drunkenness. I have never thought that anyone who is unfortunate enough to become intoxicated ought to be arrested from time to time appear in court charged with drunkenness. It is quite appropriate that all who become drunk are arrested. In law the only ones who are liable to arrest under the police act are those who are found drunk on the public streets.

A man drunk in his home or club, or on his own premises is not, in law, subject to arrest. By way of illustration, a person who takes the name of God or the Sovereign in vain on the public street, may be summoned to court on a subsequent day, to answer for his conduct, but the same person, who was drunk on the street yesterday, cannot be summoned tomorrow, to answer for drunkenness. The person must be found drunk and found drunk in a public place and be arrested forthwith.

In this case, White was going towards his home, and as the police constable says White remarked that he was going home, I think it is to be regretted that the police constable did not allow him to proceed home.

I have very carefully considered the evidence, and have read the law and decisions bearing on this case. The evidence shows that the defendant, White, who had been drinking a good deal during the day and evening, went from Main street up Magistrate's alley, a short cut to his home, on Hockland road, that the police constable followed him up and in his testimony the policeman said that "because White was going home; that "White was at the head of the alley when I started after him;" that "I showed White along; and that "White said 'hold on,' and that he would go home;" that "I struck White on the head with the baton and made him bleed;" that "I handcuffed White;" that "I find him White when he started to resist."

When White appeared in court at the trial he had a wound on the right side of his head and a cut on the left side and also three abrasions on his face. The physician who was called to attend White when he was arrested, testified that "I found a man covered with blood, unrecognizable, was the defendant. I washed blood off his face. He had a lot of abrasions, and his eyes might have been dragged. There was blood all over his face; in a wound, two or three inches long I put two stitches and one stitch in the other wound, both wounds through the scalp. The contusion wound might have been done with a blunt instrument. The man was under the influence of liquor. The two big wounds were the only serious ones; White was smart on if he had been in a tussle, under his arms. He was bleeding a little when I found him."

Continuing, the Magistrate said: "I can find no English or Canadian case in which such wounds, such injuries were inflicted by a police constable as are detailed here by the physician and which I observe on the face and head of the defendant. Often unfortunately, who are arrested, resist by holding back. White did when the policeman was 'choving him along,' and such conduct on the part of most drunken men must be expected, but with resistance and assault on the officer under the police act are something quite different from what has been well termed the expected resistance on the part of a drunken man."
