there to perfect their further plans.

Troops were accordingly ordered out, and even details of surly seamen, wling at being deprived of their sustomed shore liberty, were de-led from the frigate, which haped to be the only war vessel in ion in the harbor. Hornigold, eau and one or two of the others wn to be former companions of the caneer were closely interrogated, ut they steutly declared they did not ow his whereabouts and had seen ng of him. Later in the afternoon was observed that Hornigold's pine was not in the harbor. Indeed, cunning adroitness, that master iner himself called attention to the cursing the while his old comier for his alleged theft of the nat and declaring his willingness to in in the search for him. It was wn to the authorities that the exen of the boatswain's brother by Morgaa had shattered the old intimacy ich subsisted between them; conseently his protestations were given nce, and suspicion of collusion s diverted from him. Lord Carlingford finally determined to send the Mary Rose to sea in an eneavor to overhaus the pinnace in the hope that the former vice governor might be found on her, although the hances of success were but fairt. The frigate, however, was not provisioned watered for a cruise after her long royage from England There had beea derable scurvy and other sickness on the ship, and she was in no condito weigh anchor immediately She would have to be resupplied and he sick men in her crew replaced by lrafts from the shore. Besides, in acdauce with the invariable custom, een given shore leave for that afternoon and evening, and those few who the Blue Anchor inn and similar taverns and would be utterly unable to work the ship should they be called on to do so without being given a chance to sober up. This would take time, and Lord Carlingford upon the ntations of his sea officers decided to wait until the morrow before

As he could do so, not only personally, but through his able lieutenants, Hornigold busied himself during the day and the preceding night in enlisting as vicious a gang of depraved ruffians as could be gathered together in what was perhaps the wickedest city in the world. It had been decided after conference between the leaders that there was no place within the confines of Port Royal itself where so many men could meet without exciting suspicion. He had accordingly appointed a rendezvous for the night across the narrow entrance to the harbor, opposite the fort, uncer the trees which overshadowed the strand, some distance back from high water mark. Singly or n groups of two or three the men bad gone across in boats after sunset. a cressfully eluding observation, for the night was moonless and very dark. There was rum in plenty under the trees on the point, but care was taken by Roes Braziliano, Raveneau and the others, even including Velsers, that no one should drink enough to lose entire control of his faculties or to become obstreperous. No fires were lighted; no emoking was permitted. Strict silence was enjoined and enforced. It was perhans 10 o'clock before all were assembled.

When morning had cleared their brains of the rum they had taken, there led been ferocious opposition on the part of the older men. Not that they objected to buccaneering. They were eager for the chance once more. But memory of Morgan's betrayals of his old comrades rankled deep. There were many besides Hornigold who had promised themselves the luxury of engeance upon their old commander. There were none, however, who had so dwelt upon it as the boatswain, nor were there any whose animosity and determination compared to his fierce hatred. He was therefore able at last to persuade them into a surly willingness to accept Morgan as their captain in this new enterprise. Indeed, with-out him they could do nothing, for there was no one who possessed the ability or experience to lead them save The best men of the old stamp were now in the south seas and far away; they had been driven from the Caribbean. It was not difficult for Hornigold to show them that it must be Morgan or no one.

Their feelings of animosity were, perforce, sunk beneath the surface, alhough they smoldered still within their breasts. They would go with him, they said. But let him look to himself, they swore threateningly. If he betrayed them again there were men among them who would kill him as remorselessly as they would stamp on a centiped. If he behaved himself and the expedition on which he was to lead them proved successful they might forgive him-all but old Horniold. Truth to tell, there was no one nong them who felt himself so onged or so badly treated as the one tenvenomed sailor.
