We meet the mammoth in North Africa, and in this connection we come across a very interesting point. It is that the mammoth is today a mehemoth. Anyone can understand how easily the initial "M" might be corrupted to "me" (as cold in the head would be to), and there we have the Behemoth of Job, an elephant, not a hippopotamus, as the majority of New Yorkers have been led to believe, or if the original word was contracted, mehemoth readily becomes mammoth.

But where the mammoth is so supremely instructive is that, on the day of his death, or almost immediately afterwards, he was considered a mehemoth, just as he was thousands and thousands of years ago. His flesh is still fresh—was and is still fresh, and there is quite a small trade in mammoth gelatin; his fat is still fresh, it is used for fuel in Kamchatka to the day; and, oddest of all, the food in his stomach is sometimes found quite fresh, showing that he must have been cut off suddenly, as it were in his prime.

Now the only way of accounting for this swift, complete, world-wide destruction is some stupendous catastrophe. Of the bones of animals of this age, clearly almost to demonstration they had sought refuge on the mountains, the rising flood of waters that swamped the rigging of a sinking ship.

These changes must have been accompanied by tremendous changes in the more conclusive it appears. In Southern Europe, and even in England, we come across remains in the bones of the animals of this age. Clearly almost to demonstration they had sought refuge on the mountains, the rising flood of waters that swamped the rigging of a sinking ship.
