Sin has two aspects—one divine, as wholly opposed to the will of God; the other human, as proceeding wholly from the will of man	167
Will, therefore, as no mere product of natural causation, has a certain infinitude, so that it cannot be coerced even by the Infinite. Accordingly, in the abstract a finite will may be conceived as eternally opposed to the infinite Will. This abstraction is embodied in the tragic conceptions of a Titanic or Satanic will, travestied in the immoralistic "overman" of modern playwrights, treated by Shakespeare as properly a theme for comedy in Falstaff	159
§ 2. Repentance or Conversion	163
1. Negatively this change means becoming dead to the old life of sin	165
2. Positively , being born again to a new life of holiness	168
1. Such conversion may be sudden and violent, and its suddenness and violence are not out of analogy with familiar natural changes	170
2. But it is not necessarily or normally so	172
3. Though suddenness and violence are not without value at times as giving force to the initial impulses of the new life	175
§ 3. Atonement	176
Conversion must assume that it is possible for a sinner to abandon his sins; and this implies, further, that the laws of nature, embodying the will of God, are favourable to such abandonment of sin. But abandonment and forgiveness of sin are identical. They both mean that the will of the sinner is brought into harmony with God's will, that he is at one with God. This harmony forms the essence of atonement in its ethical aspect	177

CHAPTER IV

CHRISTIAN CHARACTER

Unity of virtues or excellences as being all modifications of a common type. Difficulty of classifying and naming the virtues. Aristotle's method of classification and nomenclature. Under any classification or nomenclature the virtues must be viewed as the highest excellences of human nature in its various spheres of activity	182
