All Eyes On Canada

From the general attention that Canada is receiving from American newspapers, it is apparent that all eyes are turned towards Canada, and there is no likelihood of any falling off in the rush of American settlers to this country.
Discussing the possibilities of this country in a recent issue the Chicago Canadian-American says:
"Ontario—now called 'the garden of Canada'—was a wilderness when Illinois was in her prime. The other day students from the Ontario Agricultural College captured the gold medals for efficiency at a Chicago exhibition. Every week prospectors are digging up fresh evidences of untold wealth in her mineral districts. The prairies of Manitoba yield crops that stagger statisticians, and she is still only making a beginning. And then there is what is called 'the last west' vast territories of pregnant soil that will some day enrich millions and fill to overflowing the granaries of the world. Canada offers today more than awaited the new comer in Illinois thirty years ago. She offers to the masses what only a few can secure in these congested states—homes of their own, healthy surroundings in which to raise their families, and the prospect of a comfortable old age."
