Odds and Ends.

The recent Missionary Congress at Toronto, of which we are hearing so much, revealed a splendid spirit dominant in the churches of Canada. It is being recognized at last that truth is a trust, and that no man and no country is justified in being treated as a selfish treasure. The gospel that saves one man, at once becomes the means of his saving another, and the remarkable zeal displayed at the Congress for the work of declaring the glad news of salvation to every country and people is evidence of the growing recognition of the fact, that with the truth comes a task, and with the task the power of privilege. But in the fulness of this great interest, it is vitally necessary that other equally important facts should also be recognized. Unless this is done, the great wave of missionary enthusiasm will break in utter failure. In engaging in the commendable task of converting the heathen, and in giving religious ideas and ideals that should stimulate and save them, it is very evident that the first thing to do is to discover who, and where the heathen are.

A suggestion is often valuable and worthy of consideration. In looking for the heathen, explore Canada first of all, and it may be that the people who need the Christian gospel most of all, are in the very town or village in which we live. As a matter of fact, it is quite certain that the old idea of a heathen as being a fantastic creature with a ring in his nose is entirely erroneous. The amount of religion a man possesses is not to be judged by his sanctimonious airs on the Sabbath, or the ease with which he approaches the communion service each month in the year. It is not necessary to cross the Pacific to find heathenism, more than with methods. It is evidently not incompatible with respectability. It seeks strange gods under many guises. It denies God in many ways. It often wears the cloak of religion, slipping it off that it be free to engage in the business transaction, or a political deal. Without any of the supposed embellishments, it may be just as truly heathenism as any heathenism found in a South Sea Island, where the inhabitants worship some miserable caricature of the deity.

There is enough political heathenism in Canada to occupy the attention of every missionary that all the churches can produce or pay for. The power of Christianity can be put to no better or surer use than the purging of our own country, and even our own towns. If we cannot do this we are bound to be discredited abroad. The man who does not take his own medicine, when he has the very disease that he claims that it will cure, does not deserve much consideration. There was shrewd sense in the act of the Chinese merchant, who, when his goods began to be impregnated with Christianity, sought to save them from its influence by sending them to America.

No amount of this enthusiasm for the salvation of the heathen abroad can possibly excuse or atone for the spathy or indolence concerning the heathen at home. The work that should command us to-day is to establish integrity in places high and low. If religion does not mean absolute intolerance of all shades of dishonesty, then we have something to learn about. The commercial religion which only shows itself on the Sabbath, at mid-day, and at the communion service, is no less heathenism than that found in Central Africa or China. Let the Kingdom of truth, equity, justice and brotherhood come, and come here, and then we may go forth to lands afar with a power and influence that would be invincible.

ODDS AND ENDS.

The death of Mr. Sidney Duncan, a former resident of Wolfville, occurred at Boston on the 13th inst. The deceased was 46 years of age and was of Andrew Duncan, of Gaspeau. Besides his father he leaves a widow and two sisters, Mrs. Norman, of Gaspeau, and Mrs. Ross Fraser, of Wolfville. Mr. Duncan had resided in Boston for nearly twenty years, during which by industry and good business habits he had acquired considerable property. He had been in poor health for the past two years, evidently the result of too close application to business. He had many friends in Wolfville, who learn with sorrow of his death in the prime of life.
