Harold the Outlaw

The Gauger of Skene.

CHAPTER L. MOUNT CAIRN-A TRI

RETURN.

Harold went away, and Walter Adamson remained invested with full power and authority—a delegation which we are sure he would not fail to maintain with leading fidelity. Such stem firmness, yet generous forbearance, on the part of Harold did more to subdue opposition than any vindictive manifestation would have done. It excited no gratitude, for natures like those seted on are incapable of gratitude, but it kept them from resorting to active resistance or hostility. They had been given a week to quit Mount Caira, but less sufficed for them, for on the third day Lady Logan and Gilmour left the place with all their belongings. They went away in sullen and bitter silence, no one being sorry to lose them. The ser vants, the tenants, all connected with the estate, openly rejoiced-in the prospect of Harold's return, and had begun to make such preparations as the short time allowed to give him an enthusiastic reception. The people of the district had their interest strongly roused in the same direction, and as every one wrought with avidity, by an early flour on the day appointed the mansion-house and its surroundings had assumed quite a festive appearance, everything giving token that a great gala day had come. Earth and sky seemed to partake in the general joy, for a lovelier morning never smiled on a Scottish land-scape than that which rose to witness the entrance of Harold Logan en the possession of his inheritance.

But it was not till they entered within the gates that the full truth burst on the amazed occupants of the carriage. The avenue stretched before them one long vista of flowered and festooned wreaths, crowded with a multitude of gaily-dressed people, who rent the air with deafening shouts, as the band stept forth from the wall where they had been stationed, and taking the head of the procession, changed the air to "See the Conquering Hero Comes."

sweet and grateful smiles that all were captivated.

Thus they proceeded up the avenue, attended with shouts and songs and vociferating huzzahs, Harold recognizing special acquaintances in the throng, and accompanying his recognition with particular acknowledgments. Suddenly his eyelighted up with increased pleasure, for in the centre of a group under a spreading beech tree he caught sight of Daddy Duff, waving his sou-wester on the top of his long stick, hurrahing and gesticulating with wild delight. He pointed him out to Lizzie, then held out his hand, and beckoned him to appreach. Instantly a way was opened between Daddy and the side of the carriage, and the old man, rather against his will, was pushed forward.

"God bless ye, Sir Harold—God bless ye, and the mistress, and the laddie," he exclaimed."

Ere he wist, Harold signalled to those around to hoist Daddy on the box. This was done amid deafening cheers, and for the rest of the way the old mendicant shared in the honours of the hour. Such a signal mark of respect paid to his humble but devoted friend added in double measure to Harold's popularity. It showed that if adversity had not broken him down, prosperity would not cause him to forget those who had aided him in his time of need.

The crowning point of the covation was reached at the entrance hall of the manision, where stood the servants, the tenants; and a host of country gentlemen, Walter Adamson, Kenneth Fraser, Dixon, and many more, in front of a magnificent florad elevice erected in front of the door.
