The burning question of the day in lectrical and railroad circles is the relative part which steam and electricity are to play in the railroad traffic of the future. Cut of the engrossing and exhaustive discussion of this subjec which has lately been in progress the public is, at length, beginning to forn a definite idea of the outlook. The prob lem for which a solution has been de-sired is "Steam or Electric ty." The soution reached is "Steam and Electric-ty." As Frank J. Sprague puts it, the question narrows itself down to the number of train units operated between erminal points. Make that number sufficiently large and the electric mo tor is the best means of propulsion whether for high or low speed. Decrease this number and you must rely on steam. In other words, electricity will but partially take the place of steam locomotive for railway service,
