Perhaps it was the thought of this one

Perhaps it was the thought of this one woman's face, the woman he had once seen walking down the drift, her figure lined out against the stormy sky, that it led him to think of the other face, the face hidden in the mad house. At any rate, with a sigh, or rather a groan, he swung himself around from thegate, and begun walking homeward at a brisk pace.

CHAPTER 11. THE COLONEL MEETS THE SQUIRE.

THE COLONEL MEETS THE SQUIRE.

Saddenly, as Col. Quaritch was contemplating these various views and reflecting that on the whole he had done well to come and live at Honham Cottage, he was startled by a loud voice saluting him from about twenty yards, distance with such a peculiar vigor that he fairly jumped.

"Col. Quaritch, I believe," said, or rather shouted, the voice from somewhere down the drive.

of the house.

Câl Quaritch glanced up curiously to see the the owner of the great voice might be, as the owner of the great voice might be, as the work of the control of gentlemen—as English country gentlemen used to be.

"How do you do, sir, how do you do? My name is de la Molle. My man George, who knows everybody's business except his own, told me that you had arrived here, so I thought that I would walk around, and do myself the honor of making your acquaintance." CURE Colonel.

"Not at all. If you knew how uncommonly dull it is down here you would not say that. The place isn't what it used to be when I was a boy. There are plenty of nice people about, but they are not the same stamp of people. It isn't what it used to be in more ways than one," and the old aquire gave something like a sigh, and thoughtfully removed his white hat, out of which a dinner napkin and two pocket handkerchiefs fell to the ground, in a fashion that reminded Col. Quaritch of a climax of a conjuring trick.

"You have dround on the said that since died.

ion that reminded Col. Quartich of a climax of a conjuring trick.

"You have dropped some—some linen," he said, stooping down to pick the mysterious artieles up.

"Oh, yes, thank you," answered the visition. "I find the sun a little hot at this time of the year. There is nothing like a few handkerchiefs or a towel to keep it off, and he rolled the massive napery into a ball, and cramming it back into the crown, replaced the hat on his head in such a fashion that about eight inches of white napkin hung down behind.

"You must have felt it in Egypt," he went on—"the sun, I mean. It's a bad climate, that Egypt, as I have good reason to know," and he pointed again to his white hat, which, as Harold Quaritch now observed for the first time, was encircled by a broad black band.

broad black band.

"Ah, I see," said he, "I suppose that you have had a loss."

"Yes, sir, a very heavy loss."

Now Col. Quaritch had never heard that Mr. de la Molle had more than one child, Ida de la Molle, the young lady whose face had remained so strongly fixed in his memory, although he had scarcely spoken to her on that one occasion five long years ago. Could it be possible that she had died in Egypt. The idea sent a tremor through him, though of course there was no real reason why it should. Deaths are so common.

"Not—not Miss de la Molle?" he said, nervously, adding, "I had the pleasure of seeing her once, a good many years ago, when I was stopping here a few days with my aunt."

There are times when all persons require to pay some particular attention to the hair. Shaking himself clear of his sad thoughts, Harold Quaritch turned round at his own front door to contemplate the scene. The long, single storied house stood, as has been said, at the top of the rising land, and to the south, westand east commanded as beautiful a view as is to be seen in that country. There, a mile away to the south, situated in the midst of grassy grazing grounds, flanked on either side by still perfect towers, frowned the massive gateway of the old Norman castle. Then, to the west, almost at the foot of the Molehill, the ground broke away in a a deep bank clothed with timber, which led the eye down by slow descens into the beautiful valley of Ell. Here the silver river wound its gentle way through lust and popiar bordered marshes, where the cattle stood knee deep in flowers; past quaint wooden mill houses, through The shepherd dog is not a game animal, through lust and poplar bordered marshes, where the cattle stood knee deep in flowers; past quaint wooden mill houses, through Boisingham Common; windy looking even now, and brightened here and there with a dash of golden gorse, till it was lost in the picturesque cluster of red tiled roofs that marked the ancient town. Look which way he would, the view was lovely, and equal to any to be found in the eastern countries, where the scenery is fine enough in its own way, whatever people, whose imaginations are so weak that they require a mountain and a torrent to excite them into activity, may choose to say to the contrary.

Behind the house to the north there was no view, and for a good reason, for here, in the middle of the back garden, rose a mound of large size and curious shape, which completely shut the landscape out. What this mound, which may perhaps have covered half an acre of ground, was nobody had any itea. Some learned folk said that it was a Saxon tumulus, a presumption to which its parient ways. Saxon tumulus, a presumption to which its ancient name, "Dead Man's Mount," seemed to give color. Other folk, however, yet more learned, declared that it was an ancient British dwelling, and pointed triumphantly to the hollow at the top, wherein the ancient Britisherswere supposed to have moved, lived and had their being, which must urged the opposing party, have been a damp one. Thereon, the late Mrs. Massey who was a British dwellingite, proceeded to show with much triumph how they had lived in the hole by building a huge shaped mushroom over it, and thereby turning it into a summer house which, owing to the unexpected difficulties in the construction of the roof, cost a great deal of money. But as the roof was slated, and as it was found necessary to pave the hole with tiles and cut surface drains in it, the result did not clearly prove its use as a dwelling place before the Roman conquest. Nor did it make a very good summer house. Indeed, it now served as a store place for the gardener's tools and for rubbish generally. The man who makes light of a heavy cold has occasion not infrequently to regret the error of his weigh.
