When Wooing Jane

By FANNIE HAESLIP LEA

Copyright, 1905, by Fannie Haeslin Lea

Jane came slowly down the stairway, hesitated a moment at the library door, then gave herself a mental push and

"I'm sorry I've kept you waiting," she said sweetly, trailing her violet chiffons across the polished floor. The big man beside the fireplace ignored preliminaries. He looked from her eyes to the cluster of double violets on her breast.

"I see you got my flowers-and the message." She nodded. "The violets are dearand I'm sorry you're going away. It isn't for long, is it?" with timid hesitation. "For good and all. I leave tonight on the 11 o'clock train, so that I haven't much time." "Oh, tonight!" said Jane and sat down with apparent indifference and a real need for support.

He leaned one elbow on the mantelshelf and towered over her.

"They've given me a splendid place in South Carolina. It's what I have been waiting for, and it's come like a shot. I only got the appointment today."

dering what there was in the world to live for, after all. 'He looked at her for a moment silence, and she looked at her violets

"I congrafulate you," said Jane, won through a queer grayish mist.

"Jane," he said at last, "you know what it is I want to ask you, don't you?"

Jane's heart missed a beat unac countably, then throbbed like mad to make up for lost time. She tried to speak.

"Ja-ane," called a voice in the hall. Where are you, Jane?" "She's in the library," Jane heard her sister answer. "Sister, here's Lillian."

"Just a minute," pleaded Jane half aloud and ran out of the room. Thurston heard a murmur of voice in the hall. "I won't stay-no, indeed, I won't."

said one, and another, Jane's own, answered-he realized with satisfaction, not quite regretfully - "I wish you would. There was a soft flurry of skirts, a ervous little laugh, and Jane came slowly back into the room.

"It was Lillian," she explained. "We run in on each other at all hours, and she didn't know you were here, so she wouldn't''-"I haven't much time," said Thurston gently. "Let's not waste it on Lillian. Do you remember what I was Jane remembered.

"Tell me, then," said the man, "is it vorth while my saving it-don't we"me one's coming," breathed Jane, and Thurston released her hands in "Jane," said a mild voice from the door, "the maid said your mother was Why do you have the room so here. dark, child? I can't see a thing. Why don't you light another lamp?"

"Oh, Aunt Jane," cried her name sake, stepping forward with weak ef fusiveness and presenting a dutiful cheek to be kissed. "This is Mr. Thurston-you remember him, don't you?" "Oh, yes," said Aunt Jane, "yes, in deed. I suppose you're one of the In-diana Thurstons? I had a very dear friend once, Harriet Barnes, who married a Thurston from Indiana. Any onnection of yours?"

"Not that I know of," rejoined Thurston, with tense politeness. "We are a New York family." "I never heard of that branch," said

Aunt Jane, with an air that discredited it at once. "Where did you say your other was, Janie?" "Upstairs, dear Aunt Jane. She'll be

"Are you quite well, Janie?" asked the old lady suddenly. "Your cheeks are so flushed and your hands are quite cold; you're not shivering, are you? She's such an imprudent thing, Mr. Thurston."

"Aunt Jane!" called a voice from the head of the stairway. And Aunt Jane departed.

They waited till the door had closed behind her. "Another half hour gone," said Thurston, with angry tenderness. "Your hands are cold and your cheeks the prettiest pink. Is it because

"Oh, wait," she pleaded, drawing away from him. "I'm sure I heard some one in the hall—please."
"I don't care if the whole world were just outside the door, and it apparently is," said Thurston. "I want you to answer the question I've been trying to ask all the evening—will you"—

"There is some one," whispered Jane hysterically, and flinging herself into a chair just as Bobby Martin, noisily cheerful and sure of welcome, burst

"Just got a wire," he cried gayly. "Passed my exams, Jane. I knew you'd be dying to hear, so I thought I'd run over and let you know. Hello, Thurston! Isn't it bully, Jane? I'm going up next week."

"How do you do?" said Thurston fu-"Perfectly fine," said Jane, endeavor-

"Perfectly fine," said Jane, endeavoring vainly to inject some enthusiasm into her tone. "You can't think how glad I am, Bobby."
"I knew you'd say so," Bobby agreed cheerfully, colling his awkward length into the Morris chair. "But I tell you it was no joke, cramming for these beastly things—came near flunking the German—ach du lleber—six pages of the growth of the colling his additional to the thankful for. He never thewed tobacco."—New York Press.

Ever flunk an exam, Thurston?

"No," said Thurston savagely.

"Bully for you! I say, Jane, there's fellow in the crew says he thinks I might get on if I train hard enough, and I'm going to try for end on the varsity.'

"That will be nice," said Jane weakly, "Nice! It'll be great if I can do it I say, you're looking mighty fine tonight, Jane; been rubbing your cheeks? Your eyes are as shiny"—

"How mean, Bobby! Are they generally so dull?" Jane giggled nervously. "Why did you look at the clock, Mr.

"My train leaves at 11," said Thurston gloomily. "Going away, Thurston?" queried

Bobby, with interest. "Where?" "Mr. Thurston is leaving on-to live there," put in Jane hopefully.

"Oh, I say, that's great." Her effort died unnoticed. "South Carolina's a fine old place. I was there one summer. I tell you what, Thurston, they have the prettiest girls you ever saw Jolliest, brightest things - not a bit stiff. A fellow can have a mighty good time there."

"I suppose so," said Jane stiffly. "I dare say you had a good time there yourself. Was that the summer you were expelled from college? I should not think, Bobby, that you would care to talk about it."

"Well, for heaven's sake!" cried the injured Bobby.

Thurston looked at the clock again with ostentation.

"Won't you play the 'Serenade' for me?" asked Jane desperately. "You know I can't play anything but 'The Good Old Summer Time,' two fingers, and I'm too shy to play before people."

"I meant Thurston, Bobby," explain ed the girl, with suspicious sweetness. "I know what you can play."

Thurston stalked grimly over to the piano and dropped his hands on the keys with a thud, while Bobby sat back complacently in his chair and Jane fidgeted in hers. He struck sev eral heavy chords, then began the ten der monotone of the "Serenade," but the nervous irritation, vibrating to his finger tips, jarred the harmony and Thurston, breaking off with a discordant crash, swung round upon the stool "I can't play tonight," he said viciously, returning to the fireplace. "Why, you were doing fine," said Bobby, with polite surprise. "You're too modest about it."

Thurston set his teeth, squared his shoulders and looked at the clock. It was nigh upon the eleventh hour.

"Mr. Martin," he began grimly, "I am leaving upon the 11 o'clock train tonight. This is the last opportunity shall have of seeing Miss Wallis When you came in I was about to ask her to marry me. I am going to ask her now. Will you defer your visit, or do you care to hear me?" Jane gasped; so did Bobby, the good hearted blux-

"Oh, I say," he began, springing to his feet in direct confusion, "I'm no end sorry. I wouldn't have done it for the world. What a duffer I've been. I'm awfully sorry.' "So am I." said Thurston.

"I hadn't an idea"-"So it seems," interrupted the older man, with suppressed rage, "but since I have suggested one to you"-"Oh, Bobby," cried Jane, with a nysterical little laugh.

"Young ass," muttered Thurston, taking a step toward Jane. Bobby fled incontinently and the door slammed behind him. Thurston caught Jane and the vioets and the violet chiffons in his arms, crushing them close. "We don't have to say it; we know," he declared exultingly.

was more than half a sob, "but we wanted a chance to say it anyhow." A bit of coal fell from the fire to the hearth with a tiny crash,

"Was that a step in the hall?" murmured Jane. But she did not move.

Long Words.

In Frederick Saunders' "Salad For the Solitary and Social" he says, "The naturalist Lovell published a book at Oxford in 1661 entitled 'Panzoologicomineralogia,' which is nearly as long a word as Rabelais' proposed title for a book—namely, 'Antipericatametapar-hengedamphieribrationes!'" And in a footnote he gives two others from a pamphlet in his possession, published years ago in London. The title reads, "Chrononhotonthologos, the Most Tragical Tragedy That Ever Was Tragedised by any Company of Tragediaus." The first two lines of this effusion read:

Aldeborontiphescophosno! Where left you Chrononhotonthologos? It is stated that there is an English dictionary containing the only word of eleven syllables, "Honorificabilitudi-nity." "Disproportionableness" is given as the longest reasonable word in the English language.

One Redeeming Feature. A Kentucky woman is responsible for the following story.

"In the tobacco region of my state," said she, "the men live and move and have their being in the smoky leaf. There was a woman whose husband died. He had been an all around bad sort, and therefore when the bishop of the diocese called he was surprised to find the widow crushed with grief. He tried to console, but, finding her obdurate, he finally became irritated.

"I take great pleasure in recommending your Burdock Blood Bitters to any one who may be troubled with pimples on the face. I paid out money to doctors, but could not get cured, and was almost discouraged, and despaired of ever getting rid of them. I thought I would give B. B.
