A dash of warm-breathed, blinding rain, a rush of runshine through the gloom, And o'er the silent, drowsy earth, the old gray orchards break abloom

A touch of mystic, hidden power, a silken cover thrilled in twain,
And lo! a winged flame takes flight from where a creeping thing has lain. Then swift the hills are made aware of what the the valleys knew before—

That nature's younglings are awake and spring is knocking at the door.
